Dorothy Dix Says—

FATHER SHOULD DEMAND HIS RIGHTS AS HEAD OF FAMILY

Disciplining Children Is Within His Jurisdiction — If Mother Interferes She Should Be Put In Her Place

DEAR DOROTHY DIX—The young father who wrote you not long ago about his wife not permitting him to discipline his son is a pitiable figure, the more so since it is his own fault. He lost his position as head of his home through his own weakness right at the start of his married life. If he had then firmly assumed his rightful place, he would not face this trouble now.

However, the past is past, and he has only two courses of action left to him now. He can either meekly sit back and watch his son's life being ruined, or he can take back by force his place as head of his home. Here is one method which, though drastic, has the advantage of surprise and speed of action. The next time his son needs to be punished let the father do it. He may have to lock himself and the boy in a room to keep the child's mother from interfering. Then, if she raises hell, as she probably will, let him take her across his knee and use the same strap on her until she is thoroughly mastered and no longer fighting.

Then, and this is most important, let her husband take her in his arms, no matter what she says or does, until she has cried out her shame and pain and humiliation; and when she can listen to reason let him tell her how much he really loves her and that he has been driven to take this course in order to save their home, their marriage and their child, all of which are being ruined by her folly. If she doesn't love him, it will probably mean divorce. In that case he should fight for custody of the child and try to save him from his mother.

These suggestions are not theory. They are the result of experience, for I was one of the fool mothers who was ruining her child, but who was saved by her husband who had the courage to teach her her error by force when she refused to learn the hard way.

A WOMAN WHO KNOWS

ANSWER—I publish this letter in full in the hope that it will brace up some weak father, who sees his children being ruined by their fond and brainless mother, into at least making some effort to save them from her before it is too late.

In all the world there is nothing else so strange as that men who are brave enough to meet the other trials of life without flinching, and wise enough to deal intelligently with the other problems of existence, turn into cowards and quitters before a silly woman's tears and hysterics, and do not even make a fight to preserve their own personal liberty, nor to protect the children they have brought into the world.

LIFE DISCIPLINES WITH A HARD HAND

There is hardly a mail that does not bring me a letter from some desperate man telling me that his wife is spoiling their children rotten; that she is letting them grow up without morals or manners; that she indulges their every whim and lets them do just as they please. He can foresee the hoodlums these brattish children are going to grow up to be, the

A MUSICAL NUMBER

Sir Arthur Sullivan, of Gilbert and Sullivan fame, set out with a companion one afternoon to attend a tea at a house where he had been once before. When they reached the right street, Sir Arthur could not remember the house number.

"Never fear, I will find it," he said. Then he proceeded to walk up to each door, give its bootscraper a gentle tap with his foot, and listen closely to the tone it gave out.

"Here we are," he said finally. "E flat—I remember the note from my last visit here."

THE MIRACLE EASTER BONNET

Mother and I went shopping to buy an Easter bonnet. I wanted one with a big blue bow. And we went roses on it. Mother wanted a perky hat with a bow like this and a bow like that.

So we hunted up and we hunted down. Until we had searched every store in the town.

But never a hat in a store did we see.

That was suited for mother or suited for me.

Till at last we came to the quaintest place.

And piled on the shelves both high and low.

In every color of a bright rainbow. Were hats for mother and hats for me.

To deck us out for our Easter spree.

But I didn't choose one with a big blue bow.

I fell in love with another, and so I chose one with a daisy on it—

Not to me just a duck of an Easter bonnet.

It made me think of what lovers say.

"He loves me, he loves me not."

As the beautiful petals they pull.

When I am older I'll do that, too. But I'll pick a daisy with just a few.

So I say: I pull them they're sure to say:

"He loves you the very best today."

But when I went to church on Easter Day.

And knelt in that old-fashioned pew to pray.

I forgot all about my Easter bonnet.

When the choir sang an Easter sonnet.

And the preacher told that wondrous story.

How Jesus arose in majestic glory.

And the sun through the windows in gold and blue.

Made every old hat in the church seem new.

And I felt as I knelt in that church stand.

That Jesus Himself must understand.

That all could not have an Easter bonnet.

So He sent the sun to shine upon it.

And to tell that story as they knelt to pray.

All things would be new some Easter Day.

CARE OF HANDS

War or no war, we must have a spring-clean as regards beauty. Hands perhaps suffer worse than anything in the cold weather. The necessity to carry heavy shopping baskets for considerable distances means that your hands get absolutely dead, and the result an unlovely crop of chilblains. I do know, from personal experi-

HOW DO YOU SHOP?

That may seem a strange question at first, but let me explain. Awaiting my turn to be served in a shop recently I noticed the assistant add up a considerable amount of articles and stating their cost remark:—Is that right, madam? To which the customer replied:—Oh I suppose so, but I never know the price of things. I never ask how much they are, and I never count my money. I just trust to luck, you know.

The assistant and I exchanged meaningful glances, says the commentator, and when this hapazard customer had departed she said to me:—"Well, it seems a funny way of doing things, but I wouldn't be surprised if she gets done in for a bob or two, every week!" A sentiment with which I entirely agreed. If that woman had had to earn the money she spent so easily she would be far more careful with it.

Laziness is at the real root.

The Wade Kidnap Case

By Leslie Cargill

Commonsense should have told him that the Vera and Emily were not equipped for a long voyage. And the fishery protection vessel was only the forerunner of others that would inevitably close round.

Out of the blue came the seaplane. Scranton leaped from the radio cabin, pistol in hand. Later he admitted dreading being machine gunned, or even bombed. At such a moment there was no time for great thinking.

It was unnerveing to see that great machine hurtling down like a falcon after her prey.

Capt. Marley had waited such a glorious opportunity. His attack was launched at a moment least expected. The gangsters were foolishly wasting ammunition, and were too much occupied to protect their rear.

Pandemonium reigned as the crew went joyously into action, snatching at whatever weapons came handiest, content with bare knuckles so long as these could stand against enemy flesh. There was no necessity for the gunboat to intervene. Marley and his men were quite capable of doing their own mopping up.

"Man, it was grand," the captain acknowledged when Major Mossion came aboard to inspect the result of the timely intervention. "Better than the rough house in Reykjavik last Lammas."

"Where is the young lady?" "Smug and well out of it. You scum threatened to do her in if they weren't allowed to go scot free. On my ship, too. We'd hie had something to say about that. What are they—escaped lunatics?"

"At present they look like lumps
