That Car of Yours

By WILLIAM ULLMAN
Heart-to-Heart Talks With Auto Mobile Owners and Drivers on How to Get the Most Out of Their Cars at the Least Expense

CARBON REMOVAL HINT

When scraping out carbon do not drain off all the water until the job is finished and the head has been put on again. Here is the reason:
If some water is allowed to remain in the cylinder jackets it will catch any particles of carbon that fall through the water passages. These will drain out. But if the jackets are dry, when the system is filled up again, the particles of carbon may be washed around into places where they will tend to lodge.

TURN SPARE, SAVE WEAR

Realizing that the rear of the car is the wrong place to carry a spare tire the efficient car owner at least tries to make the best of that. That is why he makes it a point to turn the spare around now and again so that one side of the tire will not always be exposed to the mud, water and oil from the roads.
If the tire carrier is such that the spare must hang in the same position all the time at least the shoe can be turned to have the other side face the sun for a change. Or the spare can be run on a wheel for a few hundred miles.

GOING UP—NOT DOWN

There are appropriate times for passing different types of vehicles on the road, but it is important to remember that the best time for passing the most difficult obstruction—the motor truck—is when the latter is ascending hills. Here the truck is running at its lowest speed and is capable of maximum deceleration in event of a congestion of vehicles. Never try to pass a truck going downhill for it is then likely to be running at a high rate of speed and is not easily controlled.

WHY GAS TANKS FLOOD

Gasoline tanks usually overflow because no provision is made for allowing the air to expell as the gas is pumped in. This usually can be avoided by seeing that the nozzle is jammed against the neck of the tank, but another precaution is advisable where the neck is provided with a special section to act as an air vent. In this type of neck there will be two divisions, one very much larger than the other. Make sure that the nozzle directs the gasoline into the larger one, otherwise incoming gasoline and outgoing air will meet and cause an overflow of the former.

PROTECTING THE TOOLS

Tools that shake around under the seats, or back under the deck of the roadster or coupe, are not getting a square deal and thus cannot be expected to be useful in an emergency. Pliers that have come apart may be useless, while one bolt lost from a jack may mean a genuine breakdown.

LET MOTOR DO IT

It frequently happens that when the radiator drain cock is opened there will be enough sediment in the system to keep the water from draining off. While the drain plug usually can be opened and closed by means of a stick or rod, removal of the sediment is a more laborious job that requires reaching under the front axle and inserting a match stick or a nail through the plug opening. This annoyance can be obviated by running the engine with the plug open. Vibration and pressure of the circulating water usually suffice to disturb the sediment and start the water flowing out.

MAY PREVENT A SKID

It usually will save a skid to apply both the emergency and service brakes in event a quick stop is necessary. One brake band of either system of brakes may be tighter than the other, but when all the bands are used variation is less likely.

"These Women"

BY MALCOLM DUART

CHAPTER IX

Morton touched the girl lightly on the arm.

"I'll tell you everything you want to know about Mr. Parrish's case, but child—don't embarrass the poor boy by holding whispered conferences in corners."

He turned away and Audrey followed him. Her manner was subdued and she took little part in the conversation until after dinner.

When they left the dining room she took a chair by a window and looked absently into the dark street outside. The two men chatted at the other end of the room, Morton's eyes seeking from time to time to catch those of the girl.

Then, at length, she looked up. She caught the slight frown upon his brow. In quick understanding she arose and walked slowly toward the organ console.

"Do you care for music, Mr. Parrish?" she asked.

Parrish's face lighted with pleasure. Morton watched him in an effort to determine whether the pleasure arose from the girl's question or from his receiving any notice from her at all.

"I do like music," Parrish said. "The girl sat on the organ stool and arranged the stops on the instrument."

"This organ can do double duty," she said. "It plays by electricity when I'm lazy; when I'm feeling energetic I do the playing myself."

"There's a Wagner roll in here now," she said. "I trust the starting lever and the organ knobbed into the 'Wedding March.'"

The music stopped abruptly. "I thought that was another roll," the girl said, busying herself with the mechanism. Her face had colored.

"I like that," said Parrish. "It's pretty but not answer, but taking out a perforated roll, she placed it back in its container."

"I think I'd rather do the playing myself," she said at length.

She swept into the "Dead March" from "Saul," Parrish listened, happily enough, and Morton was smiling at her. When she had finished, and without pause began the tremolo of a Scotch dirge, Morton interrupted.

"Shush!" he exclaimed. "Let's postpone the funeral service."

She let her hands fall to her lap. "I'll play whatever you want me to play," she said, obediently.

"Try some light music or something lively," he urged.

There was a pucker of mischief about her eyes as she answered. "All right, I'll play 'Oh Promise Me.'"

She kept her eyes on him and sang the words lightly as she played. "Oh promise me that some day you and I—"

Morton's face was rather grim as he signaled to her that he understood. At the end he stood up and said: "Parrish doesn't know how to dance. Let's give him a lesson."

"I'll drum on his guitar and you try him out on the two-step. That's easy and almost as fashionable."

The girl arose and obeyed without demur. While Morton was tuning the instrument she instructed Parrish in the proper positions for his hands and feet.

He was a willing pupil. With knitted brows and clenched jaw he followed her instructions carefully. In time to the "plunk-plunk" of the guitar he ventured forth on the dance. He was by no means awkward, and, after five minutes of serious effort, gained confidence in himself enough to speak as he tripped laboriously around the room.

"I'm trying not to step on your feet now," he told Audrey.

She gave a quick smile. "Really you're doing very nicely," she assured him.

He fell out of step at this and there was a moment's confusion until she had him started on his way again. Morton played more rapidly. Parrish swung the girl with a little more assurance. She was light on her feet, as only girls in their teens can be. It became apparent that Parrish was enjoying himself.

"Try him on a foxtrot, Audrey," directed Morton.

There were further instructions. Parrish listened and presently became involved in a hopeless effort to combine the fox trot and two-step. Morton took his place for a moment and showed him what to do. When the older man had returned to his guitar Parrish made a fresh attempt.

"It's like trying to learn French and German at the same time," he commented breathlessly.

At the end of another half hour Parrish was beginning to make progress in his new art. They were interrupted by the butler.

"Gentlemen to see you, sir," Morton laid down the guitar. "Show him into the book-room," he directed.

He turned and excused himself to the young people. "Good thing for you to rest now anyway," he told Parrish. "You and Audrey talk a little while until I come back."

Morton's book-room was a small apartment, with shelves filling the entire wall space. Few of his books were in "sets." There were volumes of history, and travel, and science, and verse, most of them by the older writers. All showed marks of use. There were a few works of new writers and one section, separated from the rest by a glass door, was filled with volumes by those authors who delight to tell of the midnight aspects of sex.

These were less worn than the others; some appeared not to have been read at all. Their backs were stiff and fresh.

A slanting reading table was in the center of the room and beside this table Morton's visitor was seated.

Morton greeted him with a quick handshake. "Got those papers?" he asked.

The man took them from his pocket and stood them on the table. "Those fellows offer to settle at seventy cents on the dollar," he said.

With an exclamation of interest, Morton took up a typewritten sheet. He glanced over it and then read more carefully a bulky document, bound in one of the wrappers that lawyers use.

"First-rate," he said. "Is everything legally alright?"

"Needs is your acceptance," All it needs is your acceptance," he said. "If you want to sign now I'll have the notary down at my office at your signature in the morning and we'll shoot these papers back to them."

"I never made a million any easier," Morton said, seating himself at the table and picking up the pen. "I didn't expect them to offer more than twenty or twenty-five cents on the dollar at most."

The other man pointed with his finger at a line on which Morton was to sign. "You have too big a reputation down in that country for winning lawsuits," he suggested.

Morton signed his name in the three or four places indicated by his attorney and laughed. "Do you know how much actual money I've put into that scheme?" he asked.

The other man shook his head. "It was exactly two hundred and sixty-one dollars," Morton laughed.

"But," his face grew serious—"I put in five years of the hardest work I ever did in my life. And that five million would be now."

"They're getting a bargain," his visitor said, as he buttoned his coat preparatory to leaving.

Morton let him out by a door leading directly to the main hall of the building. For a few minutes Morton leaned over the carbon copies that lay on the desk and then put them away with an air of complete content.

He returned to the drawing room

FOOD for a Most Strenuous Sport

Grape-Nuts Goes Along on the Canoe Trip For the Energy it Gives

THE canoe trip, with its daily grind of muscle-straining, steady paddling, its long portages carrying canoes and equipment—surely a most strenuous vacation sport. Surely a sport which calls for a properly conditioned body—a properly energized body.

And food must supply energy. Every day the canoeist must renew his energy by the foods he eats. How important then, that he pack into the precious space in his canoe only the most highly nourishing and energizing food.

Canoeists choose Grape-Nuts first—for these good reasons:

Grape-Nuts is a power food—a food which gives the body an abundance of the most valuable energy-giving nourishment. And Grape-Nuts supplies this nourishment almost at once, for the special milling and baking process by which Grape-Nuts is made, prepares it for easy digestion. The two healthful grains, whole wheat and malted barley, combine in Grape-Nuts to give dextrins, maltose and other carbohydrates for energy; iron for the blood; phosphorus for healthy teeth and bones; protein to build sturdy muscles and body tissues; and the vitally essential Vitamin-B. Grape-Nuts is a crisp food—so delightfully crisp that you want to chew Grape-Nuts, thus giving healthful exercise to your teeth and gums and also aiding digestion.

The kind of food the canoeist needs for his trip! But isn't Grape-Nuts the kind of food you need, too—to carry you successfully through your hard days? Ask for Grape-Nuts at your grocer's today. Sold in wax-wrapped packages ready to eat. Four teaspoonfuls, costing less than one cent is sufficient for each helping. Serve with milk or cream.

Or try Grape-Nuts free, if you wish, by taking advantage of the offer below.

Headache and you shouldn't have treated him that way."

"I wanted to talk to you," she said.

"Audrey," he said, "little white lies are as mean as any other lies, actually. They are not meant to the people who tell them to; they are meant to ourselves. They get us a habit of mind where we automatically tell falsehoods—and I don't want you ever to tell falsehoods, dear."
