At the Opera House last night, Jere McAuiliffe and his Stock Company strengthened the good impression made on the first night of appearance. Shamus O'Brien was the bill of fare, and it was presented and acted in a manner which is much in advance of the manner of portraying similar melodramas in the Opera House here. In the leading lady the Company has an actress capable of holding her audience in critical places, and thus complementing the efforts of the rest of the cast and sustaining interest until the climax of each scene is reached. Last night the dramatic elements of the play were ably treated; if at times the rollick-humor of this particular play appeared to predominate, why, it was easy to remember the light hearts of the race it told the story of. The parts were well taken; the villain was an awful villain; and the ladies were winsome; Jere a sympathy-compelling hero, whose songs were delightful. As to specialties, they, as has been said before, are excellent and given in overflowing measure. A good house greeted the performers, and such should reward this pleasure giving Company during all the nights they play.

THE AUTOMOBILE AND THE FARMER

and the country people must not be driven off the highways. He was glad to see Mr. Rogers present and hoped to hear him before the meeting ended. He would like to see the autos kept off the highways altogether, certainly on market days and Sundays. If not kept off on Sundays he feared he might lose his congregation.

Mr. Tyrrell inquired what license or tax was paid by the owners of autos and to whom. Mr. Rogers said these had not yet been fixed, but would be payable where the owners lived. Mr. Tyrrell said the farmers paid road taxes, and ought not to be forced off the roads. The horses would never get used to these autos perhaps it was the smell of gasoline. Mr. Doull said many farmers were now employing gasoline engines. A conversational discussion ensued in which Mr. Younker, Mr. Curtis and a number more took part, all of whom contended that the roads and streets ought to be kept clear on market days and Sundays.

Mr. Rogers was called upon and explained in the most conciliatory way the case from the standpoint of the auto owners. These vehicles are in use everywhere. There are five on the Island, two of which are in Summerside and had been for some time in use. He sympathized with the people in their alarm. The chairman had very fairly stated their case, but no very serious accidents had yet occurred. Sometimes the drivers were more alarmed than the horses. Speaking for himself and Mr. Jost—he could not speak for other drivers—they were taking every care to avoid frightening horses; they stopped their cars when they saw any horse afraid of them and gladly went to the assistance of a driver, be it man or woman, whom they met. Mr. Jost in two years had no accident. They were quite willing to keep off the highways on market days, and off the streets also on such days till after six o'clock. His business called him all over the Island and possibly some time he might have to return on a market day, but such occasions would be rare. The horses would get used to the autos as they had to bicycles. The chairman said the owners of horses were a thousand to one of the auto owners, and every farmer's business would suffer. He wanted to see safe roads. He was afraid some one would be killed. He and several others related instances of trouble and danger that had occurred.

Mr. Doull said he was the first to introduce the safety bicycle in 1890, and had ridden with Mr. Jost all over the Island in an auto. He had seen less trouble with the latter than with bicycles as to frightening horses. Many horses were not alarmed at all. Much conversational discussion followed. The chairman expressed his entire confidence in Mr. Rogers and Mr. Jost, that they would be most careful and would do anything they promised, but how about the tourists who were coming and bringing autos with them? He thought the Government should regulate these things. One inquired why autos were shut out of Boston? Mr. Rogers said Boston was full of autos. There were 14,000 of them in New York. Finally the following resolution was moved and unanimously adopted: Resolved that in the opinion of this meeting automobiles should be excluded from the country roads and streets of Charlottetown on market days and Sundays, and that we will use every effort to secure such legislation as may effect this, believing that the country people have rights as well as the owners of automobiles, and that in giving them four days of the week we are not asking more than our rights.

Votes of thanks were passed to Archdeacon Reagh and The Guardian and the meeting closed. After the meeting the city visitors were most hospitably entertained by Mr. and Mrs. Tyrrell.
