other stage going your way until tomorrow?"

The lady placed her hand on the bedpost as if she needed its support.

"No stop until tomorrow?" she repeated. "Why, that's terrible! I simply must get to my destination by twelve o'clock tonight, even though I have to walk. I have a most pressing engagement with a dear friend, an appointment which must be kept at all costs. See if you can make arrangements for my transportation and don't think about the expense. Call me in exactly two hours. Good evening, sir."

The innkeeper turned on his heels, left the room, on his face a puzzled expression.

He felt sure the lady needed medical aid; but after all, who was gent woman you can reason. She can look on both sides of a subject. She can broaden. If she marries a fine, strong, intelligent man, he can develop her into anything he wills. She can grow to his stature. But you can do nothing with a fool. There is nothing to work on. She is a fool to the end of the chapter.

So, if a man wants to be happy though married, let him pick out a girl with good, hard horse sense. A pretty face can catch him, but it will take brains to keep him happy and satisfied after marriage.

DEAR DOROTHY DIX: Won't you please write something that will make husbands take better care of their health? My husband, whom I love dearly, has been ailing for about a year; but he will not go to the doctor for a checkup. Says he will get all right eventually, but I don't see how he can at the rate he is going. He seems to think that all men are mortal but himself. He can see that a friend has a nasty cough or a nasty cold, but he is sure that if he neglects himself he will get along just fine.

A WORRIED WIFE

ANSWER: Why intelligent men act this way, nobody knows. Whether they have a childish fear of the doctor and what he may tell them, or whether they don't want to take medicine or can't bear to think of having any of their personal affairs interfered with, goodness only knows.

And yet every man knows that there are many diseases that, taken in their incipency, can be cured, but that are fatal if allowed to run on, and that the best way to preserve his body is just the same as it is with this house-keeping it repaired. Patching up the places that are ailing away, catching out for breaks. But men just won't see that they need medical attention until often it is too late to do them any good. That is why we have so many more widows than widowers.

DEAR DOROTHY DIX: I married when I was very young; but after several years of unhappiness I was forced to leave my husband, taking with me my little boy, who is a darling child. Now I am engaged to a fine man, but this is the rub: He is insanely jealous of my son and does not want him to live with us, and I think it would just about kill me to be parted from my baby.

What shall I do—give up my child or give up my fiancé?
MARY V. J.

ANSWER: If you are a real mother, you will stick to your child and let the man go. Your first duty is to the child you brought into the world, and you should consider that above your own happiness. Furthermore, you won't be happy if you give up your little boy. You will miss him every day and hour, and you will hear his cries for mother even above the vows of devotion of your sweetheart.

You are fortunate in this respect, that your fiancé has told you before marriage how he feels toward the child, and that gives you the chance to avoid the mistake of marrying him.

DEAR DOROTHY DIX: My husband and I were married when we were very young and somehow I feel that he hasn't the kind of love that he should have for me. After we were married he changed completely. He wasn't at all the man I thought him to be. He has a very deep love for his mother and won't listen to anything said against her. Somehow I have never liked her.

Maybe my husband doesn't love me because of his mother. Please tell me what would be the best thing to do.
C. L. S.

ANSWER: Well, daughter, I think the best thing for you to do is to try to get your feet down on solid earth and face marriage as it is, instead of worrying over its not being the romantic dream you thought it would be.

From your letter I judge that you have no real grievance against your husband or his mother. You say that you feel that your husband hasn't the kind of love that he should have for you, but he is good and kind. Well, if you are hunting for a husband who is a romantic lover, you are doomed to disappointment for there is no such animal. Nor can you expect your husband to join you in finding fault with his mother. And certainly it is no surprise that you don't love Mama-in-law. Wives rarely do.

So don't you think that the wise thing for you to do is just forget your ceave?

he to judge other people. His business was to cater to his patrons. So he went off about his duties. A glance at his watch showed the hour, two p.m. He returned the heavy silver timepiece to his vest pocket.

At exactly three-thirty, one and a half hours later, the lady in white came tripping down the stairs, opened the door and disappeared around the corner of the Inn.

The old keeper of the public house spoke to her, but she passed out without even a glance in his direction.

"Mighty strange about that woman," he said half-aloud. "Wherever she's gone to, she's left her luggage behind. I believe I'll take a look inside her room while she's out."

Suiting the action to his words, he climbed the creaking steps. The door leading to the lady's room was closed, locked. He rapped gently on its panel, then knocked louder. No answer came from within. He called out. Still no reply.

Taking a pass-key from his pocket, he turned back the lock, flung wide the door.

A startled exclamation came from the man's lips.

In the bed lay the woman he had escorted to this room scarcely two hours before.

He took her thin hand in his and put his finger on the pulse where the pulse ought to be. There was not the customary beat, and he noticed for the first time how cold that hand felt. The half-closed eyes rested upon the innkeeper in a glass stare.

Every New Year's Eve for a decade afterward the old innkeeper stood in awed silence behind his high desk and watched the lady in white come down the stairs and disappear.
