MARK TWAIN

With twinkling kindly eyes he looked on life. While laughter flowed untainted from his pen; With humor's wand he touched the thoughts of men, And serving peace, he made a jest of strife. With naught of satire's stinging, aerial mirth. And scolding the envenomed, coarse lampoon, Dismissing can and bells of the half moon. He put a mirthless girle round the earth. Age touched him with its outward sign of blight. But not his inward youth—a thing apart— Through which his pen revealed a boy's true heart. And all its joyful secrets brought to light. That jocund, bubbling spring the world shall quaff. And keep your fame secure in coming years, Which gives you now the tribute of his tears. And says farewell, deft sorcerer of a laugh. Richard Lathlem.
