Scandinavian Forest Methods

STOCKHOLM, Sweden, June 10.

Yes, Sweden will have some worth while forests in fifty or one hundred years," admitted Baron Mannerheim, head of the Kramfors company in Sweden and among the largest owners of private forests, in reply to a complimentary remark on the condition of Sweden's forests. The Baron knows Canada. He made an extended visit there a year or so ago. He saw much to admire in the industrial development of the Dominion. He thinks, however, that we are not very far advanced in the administration of our forests. "You ought to make indiscriminate cutting possible," he said. "You ought to pass laws against it. In the long run the companies would find it to their financial advantage as well as to the country's general good."

The Baron is himself an ardent believer in artificial reforestation and has done much for its promotion in Sweden. His own forestry department, under his inspiration, is probably the most progressive of any in the country, and is much farther advanced than any other. The personnel of his foresters is exceptionally high.

I don't know how old the Baron is. If called upon to guess I should say somewhere in the sixties. In all probability he will not be living fifty years hence to see the fruits of his efforts to improve Sweden's forests; certainly not to see them as they will appear after the lapse of another century. Nevertheless, his modest admission is not only typical of his own disinterested regard for the forests, but is characteristic alike of the Swedish national attitude towards the subject of forestry in general. Everybody is looking forward to and working for the future. There is not the slightest danger of Sweden ever becoming a forest bankrupt; or that the Swedish forests will ever recklessly be exhausted for the sake of providing immediate profits, however great the temptation.

That is not to say, however, that Sweden does not now possess fine forests in abundance. These forests are not now being utilized to the limit of prudence and to the full extent of the demands made upon them by Sweden's constantly increasing export trade in lumber, pulp, paper and other forest products as well as to supply all of the domestic requirements of these commodities.

After a thorough and painstaking inspection of several government forests and four extensive private forests, including those owned by the Kramfors Company, the Fiskeby Paper Company, as well as of forests owned by communities and by farmers, one is most impressed with the fact that in Sweden the forests are farmed. They are cultivated with the same care and assiduity that is given to the cultivation of the wheat lands in the Canadian Northwest or to the sugar plantations in the Southern States. The results obtained is a permanent constant and ascertainable current yield and an assurance that, barring accidents, this yield will continue indefinitely and in increased volume for all time to come.
