A HUSBAND TO MARCIA

By CAROLYN BEECHER

Chapter XXIII.

"What you spend you have, what you save you either die and leave for some one else to squander, or you invest and lose it."

It was Nell French, who laughingly made the above remark. She was playing opposite John Aldrich at a bridge party Marcia was giving in honor of her mother.

"I don't agree with you, Nell," John said. "I think one only has what one saves. That is if you are careful of dollars and cents."

"What else?" the irresponsible Nell replied. "No one can take away the good times one's money gives them, even if they take money—afterward."

There was no use for John to argue that a dollar in one's pocket was not only a man's best friend, but a protection in case of illness, old age, etc. He had tried it too many times with Marcia and been worsted. Instead he wondered, as he so often had before, if all women were like Marcia and Nell—and Mrs. Vane. He remembered his own mother, how she used to talk over with his father what they could save for a rainy day—she as well as he. But she was rather old-fashioned. Nowadays it seemed the man must not only do the earning but all the saving also. Of course many women earned big salaries, were self-supporting. He didn't mean that kind. And depressed as he was he had no wish that Marcia should do anything outside their home. He was a bit old-fashioned too.

The first of the month they moved into the new apartment. Marcia was jubilant. She was so cheery, so happy, that John felt almost guilty that he had begrudged her this happiness. Her mother, too, preening herself because of her judgment in the selection of the apartment, was full of condescending good nature and affability.

But his joy was short-lived. It lasted only until they began to arrange the furniture. Nothing really fitted or seemed to belong—it never does. Rugs were too small or improperly shaped for the place on the floor. Marcia wished them to occupy. Chairs looked shabby and needed reupholstering, new lace curtains were necessary for most of the rooms, and the bright sunshine made the new overdrapes a necessity.

Sometimes John wondered what ailed Marcia. She seemed filled with a curious unrest at times, a disinclination for the normal pursuits of life. When she was planning something new and different something for which she could spend his money, John thought bitterly, she would be, for a time, content. But no sooner was one thing finished, or perfected, than she immediately began questing for something else.

When John remonstrated with Marcia as to the refitting of the apartment, and reminded her that he had said they could not afford to spend a penny additional to the rent, she looked at him with big serious eyes, and said:

"I won't spend a penny I don't have to, John, you know I won't, but things must correspond. If you won't go to let me make the apartment look decent you shouldn't have taken it."

"I shouldn't have taken it!" John repeated to himself with a bitter laugh. "I shouldn't have taken it! Can you beat it?"

John had attended to the moving of his precious china himself. To no other hands would he intrust it. Marcia laughed at him, called him an old woman, and gleefully told her mother of his extravagance in paying $20 for a—plate.

"I had seen a hat that very day that I wanted," she reminded for her mother's entertainment, "and do you know I was fool enough not to take it. Thought I would be economical, what does John do but bring home that old china plate! But the very next morning I rang up the milliner and told her to send the hat. If John can pay $20 for a plate I guess I can for a hat."

"I should think you might, daughter. I never could understand wasting money on such a fad." Mrs. Vane replied. "Of course if one is a millionaire it is different. But to preach economy to a family, then spend money on trash isn't in keeping—not to my mind."

John said nothing, but he winced.

How often he had wanted to spend a few dollars for some rare piece of china, only to shut his eyes and his imagination against the desire. He had walked day after day by a certain window, never daring to go in, feasting his eyes on some bit of priceless pottery in the window.

What Marcia flung away in bridge losses, in entertaining people who cared nothing for her save what they got out of her, would have allowed him to occasionally add to his treasures. But save for the plate so obnoxious to Marcia he had not added a single piece since he married her. Neither had he said anything of his desires in that direction. Marcia would not understand. She considered his love for beautiful pottery just a foolish notion, not worth considering except as it took money from her. Then it was to be frowned upon.

SHIPPING CRATES.

Large numbers of live birds are shipped to market each year in such a way as to cause heavy losses in shrinkage and many deaths. Very frequently the shipping crates are not properly ventilated, with the result that many birds are suffocated. Death from suffocation is quite common where the poultry is shipped long distances in warm weather. A number of birds packed closely together in a tightly boarded box give off considerable heat and it requires a chicken with a very strong constitution to stand the conditions. All shipping crates should be made so that the chickens get plenty of air. The sides, end and top should be slatted, the slats being about three-quarters of an inch apart the distance between the slats being wide enough to allow the chickens to put their heads through. If the top slats are more than one and one-half inches apart they should be covered with wire, otherwise many deaths will occur from chickens putting their heads through when the crates are being handled. The crates should not be less than 12 inches high and not more than six inches deep. They should not be more than thirty inches wide and forty-eight inches long. By shipping birds in comfort less deaths will occur and the profits to the shipper will be greater.—M. A. J.

RELIEF WORK TO STOP IN CONSTANTINOPE

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14.— Assistance rendered by the American Red Cross to war refugees at Constantinople must be discontinued after October 1, officials of the organization said today, despite reports of the hopeless situation which will result for thousands of "fortunates in and near the Turkish capital."

The American Red Cross has expended upward of $700,000 at Constantinople officials announced. Contributions and the balance appropriations from the association treasury, it has been decided that the work was entirely beyond the capacity of a single agency. Officials of the Red Cross understood that Constantinople relief work had been presented to the League of Nations council for consideration, as it had become an international problem.

AROUSES FAMILY IN NIGHT AND DIES

Theresa, Man, 81, Dies at Home of Presbyterian Pastor. (Watertown Town)
THERESA, Sept. 6.—William

James Aitken died suddenly at 2 o'clock this morning at the home of Rev. C. A. Riley, pastor of the Flower Memorial Presbyterian church, aged 71 years. Death was due to heart failure. He aroused the other members of the family and said he was ill, dying soon after.

Mr. Aitken was born at Prince Edward Island Aug. 17, 1849, and spent most of his life there as a farmer, coming here two years ago after retiring. He married Sophia Dingwell 50 years ago, who survives with one daughter, Mrs. Riley. The funeral will be held Thursday afternoon at 2 o'clock, from the parsonage, Rev. James H. Keeling, pastor of Faith Presbyterian chapel Watertown, officiating. Burial will be made at Oakwood cemetery.
