Some persons are sending bogus news to The Guardian for publication. As soon as the guilty parties are located they will be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law. It is just possible that the writers of some "Wiltshire" and "China Point" notes, which of course were not published, may be discovered within a few days, and, if so, the manner in which they, and all other offenders in similar cases will be dealt with will make interesting reading for Guardian subscribers.

The story of Lieut. Boleyn's life, as told by himself Thursday evening at the Salvation Army Hall, was graphic, and at times thrilling. Added interest was given by the candid and boyish manner in which it was delivered, and by the costumes, which were changed during the recital, to illustrate the story more vividly. Lieut. Boleyn, a namesake of Anne Boleyn, second wife of Henry the Eighth, was born in Birmingham, Eng., and had a good home, but the death of his father broke up the home and after living with his sister for a short time, he was accepted in the Home established and supported by Judge John T. Middlemore in that city, and later was brought to Canada, finding new homes at and near Woodstock, N. B. His first home was kindly, but on the farmer's death he was taken by another farmer who was inconsiderate and miserly. His portrayal of killing potato bugs with two shingles, and other homely duties, was laughable. His lot, however was hard, though the recital of his woes was free from every trace of bitterness. Under the stress of hard work, and the lack of all sympathy and love, he grew so discouraged as to attempt his own life by taking laudanum, but recovered. From this time he began to live more thoughtfully, and with more hopeful ambitions for this world and the next. He decided to quit farming, as he had received only $10.00 for eight months' work, and had labored five years for his former master without receiving a cent. His changes to butcher boy and hardware clerk were charmingly and humorously told, followed by the recital of his meeting with the Salvation Army, and his advent to officership in that organization. A large audience listened to this story of a life which, though barely at its majority, proved to contain many pages filled with thrilling interest.
