PARIS LETTER

BY BOULEVARDIER

(British United Press)

PARIS, July 3.—A friend of mine, a croupier in the casino at Juan les Pins, on the Riviera, is presently in Paris and relates a remarkable story of a woman gambler down on the millionaires' coast. The story is absolutely authentic, as I have discovered from various enquiries, although it might well have been taken from a Philip Oppenheim romance of the Cote d' Azur.

In the gilded gambling halls of th Riviera the woman is known as "the Duchess." She says she is Portugese, the widow of a Canadian wheat king and she loses a fortune nightly at the baccarat tables. But the bizarre, slightly mysterious element of the affair is yet to come; the explanation of why she always plays until dawn.

According to the woman's own statement she went with a woman companion some years ago to a fortune-teller. The fortune-teller predicted for her friend that she would die within the year, while the Duchess learned that she herself would meet a gory end at the hands of an assassin in her apartment one night. The seer's prophecy was partly fulfilled when the woman friend died as predicted within twelve months. From that moment the spectre of fear began to haunt the waking moments of the rich woman's life.

Throughout the world she sought a means of passing the night hours in excitement so that she could banish the shadow that darkened her life and finally came to the Riviera and discovered the casinos.

My croupier friend tells me she is the last to leave the baccarat rooms after the night's play. Sometimes at nine o'clock in the morning she is still facing him across the green table, cards in hand, fast asleep. He wakens her to ask if she wishes another card. When she finds it is already dawn she gets to her feet and goes home.

This is her way of outwitting the dire prophecy. She had been warned that she would be assassinated by night in her apartment. By playing cards until dawn in the casino she is dodging destiny. When dawn comes she can go home and sleep tranquilly.

I read the other day that Paris is the most wooded city in the world, with more than twenty miles of streets and boulevards lined with grceaful trees.

As well as affording shade in the hot summer days to the perspiring Parisian, not to mention the wandering, foot-sore tourist, the trees lend a special charm to the sereets, although it is annoying at times when leaves drop down into your coffe cup as you sit on the terrace of a cafe idling away an hour or two in the afternoon.

A staff of some 5,000 men are employed all the year round on the task of keeping the trees in good condition. The increase of automobile traffic, it appears, has great ly harmed the trees, the gasoline fumes having stifled the growth of the foliage. Experiments were then made to find out which trees zest withstand the effects of petrol and the plaintain is awarded the palms, so to speak.

Most of the trees in the Paris streets are now plantains, which have deplaced many of the sturdy old oaks which could not resist the poisoned atmosphere of modern city life. There are also quite a few locust trees, which are now in flower with delightfully picturesque effect.

The care and upkeep of the city's trees must cost the Paris Municipal Council quite a lot of money, but this is considered well spent in conserving the capital's personality, if a city can have a personality.

Thanks to the vigilance of the Prefect of Police, M. Jean Chiappe, who hails from Corsica, gangsters are unknown in Paris. Most of the ugly spots in the night life of the city have likewise been wiped out, places to which in the summer gullable tourists were taken and fleeced out of their money.

On occasion, however, one learns of escapades by the remants of the crooked fraternity who still manage to eke out a precarious existence in the Paris Underworld. The latest exploit of which I have learned was related to me by a young Canadian living in Paris,

With a friend he was strolling alone the Rue de las Paix late at night when a car with two well-dres.ed and attractive young women drove up to the kerbside. The young women explained that they had just come up from the country and did not know their way. Would the young men help them?

After some conversation, the girls invited the young men to get into the car in order to point out the way, since it was late at night and the girls explained they were a little bit afraid.

On the way to the destination the suggestion was made that the party might have a drink before separating. The auto was stopped at a cafe in Montmartre and they all had several drinks at a table set for supper. Finally the bill came along. It amounted to 697 francs, more than $25! In reply to protests of the young men, the proprietor explained that there was a cover charge, that the girls had eaten some cakes and that there was this that, and the next thing to be paid for.

Happily the young Canadian knew what he was doing. Leaving his friend, he went to the nearest commissariat and explained the situation and learned that there had been other complaints about these same young women who worked as decoys to get tourists into the cafe in order that they might be fleeced. In this instance the commissariat sent a police agent along and the cafe proprietor was glad to accept four dollars in final settlement. Which shows one must watch one's step in Paris, just as in any other city!

FOOD AND PHYSIQUE

LONDON, June 30. (Briitsh United Press)—A comparison made by some medical experts between two African tribes, who exist on totally different types of diet, has revealed much interesting information on the relation of food to physical health.

The investigation, which has been made over a period of five years by Doctors J. B. Orr and J. L. Gilks, shows that the Masai, one of the tribes, who live mainly on meat and milk, are on an average five inches taller and 23 pounds heavier than the Kikuyu, who depend for the most part on cereals with some roots and fruits.

It was found that the two tribes are prey to different groups of diseases. The Masai suffered mostly from rheumatism and intestinal disorders and the Kikuyu from bone deformities, dental trouble and anaemia.

Wall Street Mirror Says:—
Special to Johnston & Ward

(Special to Johnston & Ward)

NEW YORK, July 3—Certain reports on the course of negotiations on the moratorium were reflected in an irregular market yesterday. Several issues showed a burst of strength at times but at the close were generally lower. The meeting with the French scheduled for Thursday evening has been postponed until some time Friday. Pending the outcome of this conference the market is likely to remain quiet. If a satisfactory agreement on the moratorium is reached today or over the week end it should provide the basis for a rally extending into the previous highs.

The increase in Brokers Loans was substantial and suggests that public interest in the market can be easily stimulated with the proper background.

WALL STREET MIRROR SAYS—

Very little can be expected of today's session. The market is plainly in a waiting mood and will continue to mark time until something concrete comes out of the meeting between Secy. Mellon and the French Premier. This view is not likely to make its appearance today but will be made public over the holiday. For this reason professional operators will tend to allow the market to take care of itself pending definite news from Paris. There is now a well grounded belief that in many quarters in Wall Street that the market is not likely to do more than make a double top with the Dow Jones averages on June 27th when a figure of 157.93 was recorded. Unless the market is able to get through this figure on volume professional will be on selling side in strong force once again.

A wel known organization has undertaken to canvass a sizeable list of industrial concerns in an effort to find out how much the return of optimism has meant in the way of dollars and cents to the various companies. None of the officials interviewed was able to report any pickup in business although it was said that buyers were more hopeful regarding the future. The increase of 75 millions in the loan to brokers account can be taken to mean that public participation in the market has been seen again.

Any increase in the loan account can be looked upon as a bullish factor inasmuch as the item has shown steady decrease for such a long period. It is advisable to withhold trading commitments in today's session and wait the news from Paris.

Those who missed the market in International Tel. and Tel. should be in a position to pick up on any reaction which carried it down around the 30 level.

A Dietetic Dialogue

"Did you see where some of those doctors at the American Medical Association said that the only reason fat people are fat is because they eat too much?"

"No. Here try on of these wonderful nougats."

"Well, just one more. They are wonderful. Yet, that's what some doctors said. Of course, it simply isn't true. Why, I don't eat a thing; even my husband says I eat like a bird, and look at me."

"My dear, you're not fat. You're just right."

"I'm gaining all the time, though, no matter what I do. Jim says he dosen's understand it, either. I hardly eat a thing at the table. Is that a cherry? Oh, I'll simply have to have one of those."

"My husband gave up eating breakfast a while ago, trying to cut down weight. But he make up for it at lunch and dinner. You ought to see him."

"Oh, I eat breakfast. I have to or I feel faint. Nothing much though. Just coffee and a little toast and some marmalade. And I never fix lunch, when I'm alone. Just something out of the icebox. Sometimes I forget all about it till the middle of the afternoon. Then, when I'm cooking, I always taste things so much that when I sit down to the dinner table I just don't feel like eating."

"Bridge spoils my dinner all right. Honestly, the way every-one serves sandwiches and salad and ice cream and coffee—"

"I know it. And when you're a way from home everything taste so good. Remember those cheese muffins Emma served yesterday. I got the recipe . . . . oh, tha was maple. Mind if I take another? I never like the taste of maple. You know I've told Jim positively not to bring me any more candy, but he goes right on. Says I have to eat something. And it is nice to have it around, to offer to people Well, all right, one more, and then you really must put the box away."

A COSTLY NAME

PARIS, July 3. (British United Press)—Princess Colloredo-Mannsfeld the first, may have to pay dearly for her name if her divorced husband the Prince wins his suit, which asks that she be required to pay damages at the rate of twenty dollars a day as lnog as she continued to use the title.

The Prince declares that he finds himself considerably embarrassed by the presence of two women bearing his name in Paris. It is so confusing that there should be two Princesses de Colloredo-Mannsfeld in the telephone directory, he says, and he holds that if his divorced wife insists on using the title she must pay for the privilege.

PHOENIX, Ariz., July 3.—(U.P.)—A bull snake, two and one-half feet long, crawled through an inch and one-half feeder hole in a battery brooder at the Southern Hatchery here and gobbled down a week old chicken. His greed cost him his life, as the bulge in his "tummy" prevented crawling out again.
