Married Quarters

By DAVID NYALL

Continued

"Back to Cudham, me and Jim! Does Daddy know? Who sent you, Mummy?"

"Nobody sent me. That angel in a Quaker bonnet, Naomi Bradford, came and fetched me."

"Aunt Naomi fetched you! Then where is she?"

"She's at her own house. She arrived at Cudham on Friday night, stayed with us till Sunday, and here we are! Now, go and fetch in your Jim, so that I may see you together."

Poppy flew out like the excited child she was across the muddy backyard right into Bradford's arms.

"Oh, Jimmie, it's the end of the world, or the millennium, or the Peace, I don't know which! Mummy's inside and it's all right, and Aunt Naomi's mixed up with it, and I'm so happy I don't know where to put myself."

"Stay here," said Bradford, as he folded her close and a big, slow tear, which came from God knew where, dropped from his eye and fell hot on Poppy's face.

CHAPTER XXIII

"I'm so glad you didn't bring Oldfield, Mummy. But who will look after you while you're here?" asked Poppy as they sat at tea together.

"I'm not altogether decrepit, I hope," observed Lady Augusta with a smile at her son-in-law. "Do you see any signs of total incapacity? I can still lift my own hands to my head."

Jim laughed, and the boyish ring had crept back to that laugh, soft-hearted, as a son of Susan Bradford's must be somewhere, the sight of Poppy with her mother moved him profoundly. It reminded him of a small but adventurous chicken fluffy and rather helpless, who, after rushing forth into a mad world, had crept back, a little unsteadily, to the mothering wing.

"You are eating nothing," observed Lady Augusta severely.

"I've had a good lunch," Jim explained. "And now I'm leaving you two, for I've business in Markyate."

"If you see Aunt Naomi give her the biggest hug you ever gave anybody in the world, bar none."

"You haven't cured her of her slang yet, Jim, though I observe you don't use it yourself," said Lady Augusta.

"He's too proper and solemn, Mummy. I'm only a throwback," said Poppy, and ran with Jim to the door and threw herself into his arms with something of the old abandon.

"Oh, Jimmie, I'm so happy, I'll bust. Just wait till we get to Cudham. Won't I swank you round? We'll have a church parade next Sunday, and turn all the girls' green!" Bradford kissed her and put her away rather quickly.

"Mother's calling you, Jim. Come back at once. You'll have to obey while she's here. Military discipline isn't in it now."

Lady Augusta appeared at the living-room door.

"I shall want to see your people while I'm here, my dear. If you're going into Markyate and will see them will you try and arrange something?"

"I will, Lady Augusta. We shall have a car tomorrow and do a grand tour of all the shops."

It was his one attempt at the humor of the situation, and sent Poppy into a peal of laughter.

But presently she was grave again.

It Rebuilt His Entire System

"Indigestion, a sluggish liver and constipation made my life miserable. I was thin, weak and rundown and was burdened with rheumatic pains. Four bottles of Sargon drove every pain out of my body, my entire system has been rebuilt and I've gained 3 pounds in weight.

WILLIAM O'NEIL

"Sargon Pills relieved me of constipation and stimulated my liver to normal action without nausea or upsetting."—William O'Neil, 148 Maria St., Toronto, retired business man.

Sargon may be obtained in Charlottetown from the Hughes Drug Co., Ltd.

"I'm afraid the end of the world, to say nothing of the War, must be at hand. Mumsie, or this could never have happened. I must just pinch you once to make sure, and then go and see what Satterly's Ann is going to give us to eat to-night. I hope you understand it can't be much, though General Rolfe sent me a brace of pheasants the day before yesterday."

Bradford flew like the wind into Markyate and drew up with the snort there was no mistaking at the house under the eaves, Naomi, a little nervous, came out smiling to greet him. He took her by the shoulders, pushed her very gently into the living-room, and took her in his arms.

"God bless you, Aunt Naomi. You've easily done the biggest day's work in all your splendid life."

"It's all right, then?" she asked anxiously.

"Quite all right, I tell you what, if I'd seen the old lady that day at Cudham all this misery might have been saved."

Naomi doubted it, but it was no part of her creed to throw cold water.

"So Poppy is happy again?"

"Like a bird on the wing. I've come to thank you, and I hope the hug was big enough. I was Poppy's hug really. May I have one for myself?"

"Silly boy, don't keep on thanking me. I had the time of my life among the rich and great. I'll dream of it to the end of my humble days, and I've been invited back, Jim, think of that! Well, what happens now?"

"Oh, she stops a few days, sees all the folks, and then we go back to Cudham together a happy family."

"Splendid! Well I've been thinking about the domestic conditions at Archer's while Lady Augusta is there. We must put the best face on everything for the sake of the Bradfords. I've got Clara Holt, who was cook at the Rectory so long, and married Charlie Holt, the saddler's son, to go out for the week to Poppy. She's an absolutely first-class cook and manager, and she's going out in a Saracen's cab presently, taking some stores. I want it to be nice, Jim, and these things matter!"

Jim's heart was too full for speech.

"Aunt Naomi, I know now how God permitted, you to remain unmarried. He knew how badly all we poor beggars would need you."

"Hush, hush. Now, what about your father and mother? Lady Augusta will have to see them."

"Of course, I'm going there now to arrange something. What would you suggest, afternoon tea or what?"

"My dear, I should leave it to your mother. After all, it is her house, and she has the right to dispense her hospitality in her own way. I have an idea she will get on very well with Lady Augusta."

"Have you?" Jim's face brightened.

"You've captured her anyway, Aunt Naomi. She calls you the angel in the Quaker bonnet."

Naomi laughed softly.
