John Gresham's Girl By Concordia Merrel

(Continued) "This is what he is doing!" cried the young man. She looked at him sharply, opened her mouth to speak; closed it again with nothing said, and stood quite still and silent. After a moment she asked, in a changed voice: "Then you aren't going because of something you have heard of him; something that happened... some years ago?" "No. I haven't heard anything... It's nothing to do with anything that is past... And you know I wouldn't judge him on heresy of any sort..." He broke off, and for a moment she left the silence unbroken. Then: "Very well. Thanks for letting me speak to you about this. You more, perhaps I'll take your advice and—ask him." She spoke steadily her voice in perfect control, but a new note in it made St. Abb realize then, a thing he hadn't realized before; that quite apart from the sudden knowledge that had come to him of Lee, some thing was seriously wrong with this marriage about which he had been so glad. He turned away; turned back... stammered out with boyish earnestness: "I say, I'm dreadfully sorry..." and left her hurriedly. She heard him go along the corridor to his room. Then she went straight to the study. The door was still ajar, and she pushed it open soundlessly. She found Lee standing by the window, his back towards her, head bent and hands thrust deep into his coat pockets. The sound of the closing of the door made him turn quickly, and as his eyes met hers, it seemed as if he braced his big shoulders, slightly. She came a few paces into the room and stopped. The distance between them was bridged by a look that held for a moment or two before she said: "Jim, why is Perry leaving you?" "Why don't you ask him?" she countered. "I have. But he won't tell me." "Perhaps it is because he has a better job in view?" he suggested. "You know it isn't." "So, evidently, do you." She paused a moment, her eyes still steadily meeting his. "You have done something to utterly lose his respect. What is it, Jim?" she asked again. And again he countered her question with another. "Why should you think I'll tell you?" "I don't know. But somehow, I think you will, if..." She broke off. "If you nag at me long enough?" he asked, with a disagreeable laugh. She laughed, too, rather cheerlessly. "Well, yes, if you like," she said. "I wasn't really thinking that, though." She was silent a moment, so was he. Then she said: "Perry has found out something about you..." "Well, that isn't strange, is it?" he broke in. "There's quite a lot for anyone to find out if he chooses to look." "But he didn't mean that. This is something of the present; not the past. He said so..." "Then he did tell you something?" "Only that." "What's right have you to ask further?" "Haven't I the right, Jim?" she asked quietly. "Haven't I the right?" "You mean that what I have done to you gives you the right to ask what you like; to expect everything; and to impose terms..." "I don't mean quite that. But I certainly think that you owe me something," she answered quietly. "Am I to pay for that, one thing all my life?" he cried. "I shall probably pay for it, all mine," she replied. He turned away; stood for a while staring moodily out through the window, then turned back and clung himself into the revolving chair before his desk. "What is it you want to know?" he asked bluntly. "Just what I have already asked some years ago?" she said. "May I sit down, too?" He rose quickly, coloring, and pushed up a chair for her. She thanked him and sat down. "Just exactly why," she went on, as if the little interruption hadn't happened. "A man who has always thought a tremendous lot of you, should suddenly change his opinion to the extent of feeling impelled to leave you..." "All right; you shall know. You know Linforth's?" She nodded. Then, straightened suddenly in her chair as if she knew what was coming before he said it. "I am Linforth." The words seemed to ring through the silence that followed. Then she drew a breath, steadied her voice determinedly and asked: "Since when, Jim?" "Another silence. Then: "You mean you've bought them out? Taken Linforth's over?" He nodded. "And therefore I become the traditional enemy of Gresham's," he challenged. "So it is under your orders that Linforth's wrecked our Norwegian timber deal?" "Under my order, and with my money," he assured her. "And it will be under my orders and with my money that Linforth's will wreck every deal that Gresham's attempt to make. It will be under my orders and with my money that Linforth's will bring Gresham's to ruin. Linforth's is now a hundredfold the enemy of Gresham's..." The words came quietly, slowly, but with deadly intention. She understood now. She had wondered whether, should she ask point-blank what his scheme of revenge was, he would tell her. Well he had told her. And it certainly was ugly hearing. But she would not let herself betray how deeply she was troubled she made herself speak steadily and coolly as she asked: "And Perry has just found that out?" "Yes." "And thinks..." she broke off. "That I'm playing a dirty game." "Lucy looked at him. "I'm not going to plead, Jim" she said, quietly. "I was just warning you, that's all." (To Be Continued)

Veterans Meet To Consider Recommendations

OTTAWA, Ont., Jan. 11.—(By The Canadian Press)—At a conference of representatives of all veterans' organizations in Canada, held here Saturday it was decided that the representations to be made to the Government in connection with matters affecting ex-service men of this country will be presented by them as one body. With a view to arranging the programme, the whole situation in regard to pensions and the administration of the pensions legislation was thoroughly discussed, and certain general principles were agreed upon. A sub-committee was then appointed to prepare the representations of the associated bodies for presentation to the Government, and it is expected this work will be completed and the case presented to the Federal Government during the coming week. The sub-committee was definitely instructed, by unanimous vote of the conference, that in all representations on the programme to be submitted, it take into consideration the economic condition of the country at the present time, and, as far as possible, that nothing be asked for which will materially increase the expense to be borne by the country; while, at the same time the main object will be to secure for the veterans of Canada the full benefits which were intended by Parliament in the 1930 and 1931 amendments to the pensions act. The conference was called in view of expressions of dissatisfaction which have been received by all the veterans' organizations in connection with the operation and administration of the pensions machinery. At the conference there were present, Richard Myers, representing the Amputations Association of Canada; Capt. E. A. Baker, President, Sir Arthur Pearson Club for blinded soldiers and sailors; F. G. McDonagh, president, Canadian Pensioners' Association; Col. W. H. Wood, president, and Capt. G. Brown-Wilkinson, Capt. C. P. Gilman and Dr. P. B. Mellon, representing the Army and Navy Veterans Association; Major J. S. Roper, Dominion president, Brig-Gen. Alex. Ross, 1st vice-president, Rev. John Keim, T. V. Seaton, and Major J. R. Bowler, Dominion General secretary, the Canadian Legion.
