THE STORY OF A WOMAN'S TRANSFORMATION

By Marlon Rubincam

MY CALLER

Chapter 75 That night of the dance in the hotel, Francis Meade had said to me, bending down a little as we danced together:

"Do you still live in that charming apartment down town?"

"And I nodded and smiled at him while, it seemed to me, we floated along on the rhythmic waves of the music.

"How nice of you to remember it," I answered. And was surprised to find this smooth phrase come so easily to my lips.

"Of course I remember it!" he told me. It stands out in my mind as one of the most peaceful homes I have ever been in."

"Then perhaps you will come to see us again some day, I answered, thinking how much I had wanted to say this month before, when he sat in our big chair and smoked, with his long legs thrust out over the rug. But I blushed at my darling tonight. Who was I, after all, to invite so busy and important a man to our tiny uninteresting home?"

"I will come some day, if I may," he said. And when we wished him good night he repeated that remark.

Yet a week later when Helen brought me a telephone message asking whether I would be at home that evening to Mr. Meade, I was too surprised to comprehend immediately. I laughed, her blue eyes beginning to dance with mischief, and herself went to the phone to say that I would be delighted to see Mr. Meade.

"Aunt Enid has a gentleman friend as they say in Henly Falls she teased. "And dear, but can't come around tonight so Toby and I are going to a movie, and I shan't be home until nearly 11. So you and Mr. Meade can have a lovely visit. And be sure to wear the drapy black satin—you look awfully young and pretty in it."

I did wear the youthful frock, and I took the greatest care with my dressing. As I dusted a little powder on my face, I was almost satisfied with myself. How many miles and how many years I seemed away from Henly Falls! My heart thumped excitedly as I heard a ring down stairs.

"Be quiet!" I kept repeating to myself. "Remember, you're no school girl! You're really a little old maid masquerading for a few months as a youngish sort of a woman."

How is it possible to convey through words the strange, strong winning personality of Francis Meade! I do not remember very well anything he said. I suppose talk was like any conversation might be on a first visit.

And yet it was not, I remember I asked him about some of the countries he had travelled in. "The old world was Romance to me," he said. "I was determined not only to see it, but to live in it to absorb it. So, with another boy—we were both 19—I shipped on a cattle boat, and we landed in England with only our wages from the trip—little enough.

"We had sent over our bicycles

But only a few months left to do it in! Oul world ended in February—when our money ran out. Something must be done to prolong our stay, if only till spring. I would write Jim about it.

"Tell me about that nice Miss Miller," I asked, wondering how I dared ask it.

"Ah, a charming woman, an unusually charming woman!" he began. I felt a little pang of envy.

Oatmeal—a "new dish"

This has solved the oatmeal problem in thousands of homes.

Stew raisins and mix with the cereal after it is cooked. Add the raisin juice also.

The raisins furnish mineral salts and valuable food-iron.

But best of all, they make oatmeal attractive with the lure of healthful sweets.

though, and on those we rode through Europe. When we had money, we travelled; when we ran out of it we worked. We camped out during the summer, and hunted cheap places during the winter, or went south—Italy and Spain.

"How long?"

"We spent three years altogether," he said. "We saw a lot, we did get the spirit of the different countries. We learned—oh, every mother spent a miserable time though. She was sure we were being starved or killed."

"And then? I asked gently trying to lead him on.

"And then 'Oh, the other lad was so in love with the Italian pictures of the Renaissance period that he decided to be an artist. And I was quite determined to come home and make enough money to bring my mother over, and travel in style.

"And did you?" I wanted to know.

"Yes, eventually. But I don't think it was so much fun, and I know that I could not get so close to our European cousins living at the Ritz and giving them tips for their cottage doors and buying milk and plain with their children."

"He tried it a year, but it got him nothing but the habit of wearing his hair long and the trick of discussing color values and chiaroscuro. And that got him an excellent position as art director of a movie firm.

He looked over at me, his eyes alight with laughter. And I laughed too, for no one could remain sober when he laughed like that. But secretly I was worried.

How much I had to learn! What was that long word—chiaroscuro? It was an art term apparently—well, I would ask Toby about it. And the rest—Renaissance? What did that mean? Vi might know—really, my mind was all black ignorance. I must do some reading. It was all right to keep the body young—it was as important to make the mind

"Broken Wing"

A Jump-spark Romance of Modern Mexico

BY PAUL DICKEY AND CHAS. W. GODDARD

From the Sensationally Successful Play Novelized by Charles W. Goddard.

Taking the hint the youth descended, taxied back to the patio and found Inez bandaging a cut on the top of Basilio's head.

"Who fired at me?" asked the American.

"I do," said the Mexican grinning with pride as he caught sight of the bullet hole.

"What's the idea?"

"The General leave order you must not do anything and get hurt That fly vera dangerous—so I shoot to save you—ouch!"

Inez caught sight of the bullet hole and her ministrations became suddenly rough.

Marvin was for issuing a declaration of independence but Farley led him aside.

"Now, young man when Americans get angry down here, they talk about the law and their rights. This is foolish. In the first place there really isn't any law and nobody has any rights except those he can enforce. Also you are really a prisoner, a foreign aviator whose presence in this country has not been explained.

"I hadn't noticed it."

"Well I did. Nearly a mile away and he parted my hair for me, with that bullet. What would he do if I were up close?"

"Miss you," Farley thought to himself, but he did not say anything.

So it came to pass that Phil and Basilio arrived at an understanding. The American promised not to fly again nor to try to escape until the return of General Innocencio. The Mexican agreed not to be hasty with that "deadly" rifle of his.

Basilio rarely used his head for thinking purposes but when he did the results were often pretty accurate. He reasoned that the Gringo was a man of honor and would keep his word, and above all things he didn't want to have to shoot again and spoil his record for marksmanship.

Feeling sure that the American would not break his parole, Basilio took a large drink of bulque to relieve his aching head and went to sleep in the shade, propped against one of Farley's rain barrels.

He slept heavily and as the shadows began to lengthen, he dreamed he heard the sound of horses hoofs—that it was General Innocencio, returning, that his superior said.

"Well done good and faithful servant"—that he presented the faithful one with a pocket full of silver pesos. Then he awoke.

The dream had come true—that is, in part, for there was General Innocencio indeed, but no sign of the silver pesos. In fact, Innocencio's countenance bore a most unpropitious expression and he was uttering profane and unkind remarks as he lifted Basilio to his feet by one ear.

The General then told his subordinate some things he did not know. It seems that all the time Basilio had slept, Inez and the prisoner had been away on a horseback ride. Where nobody knew, nor when they would get back.

Innocencio had at last received a message that Cross would arrive. Now after an all-day's hard ride to make sure that all would be in readiness for the ransom transaction the General reached the scene only to find his guard asleep, his prisoner gone and with him the girl he wished to marry.

General Innocencio expressed disapproval of Basilio's conduct of his face and character, his brains and even his pedigree and each point was made emphatic with a blow or a kick. He paused a moment to inquire the reason for the bandage on the victim's head. This brought out the story of the short flight and the shot, all of which somewhat mollified the brigadier.

With a fina horrible warning not to let Marvin out of his sight
