The House of Dreams-Come-True

By Margaret Fedler
CHAPTER XXXIV
THE TEST

New Year's Eve found Jean sitting alone in Claire's special sanctum—the room which had witnessed that frightful scene when Sir Adrian had suddenly gone mad.

It was a cosy enough little room in winter-time. A cheery fire crackled in the open grate, while a heavy velvet curtain was drawn across the door that gave egress to the terrace, effectually screening out the ubiquitous draught which invariably seeks entry through crack and hinge-space.

Claire was at Dover House this evening, where a New Year's dinner-party was in progress, but Jean had no heart for festivities of any kind even had she not been precluded from taking part in them by reason of her father's death.

The grief and strain of the last four months had set their mark upon her. She was much thinner than formerly—her extreme slenderness accentuated by the clinging black of the dress she was wearing—while faint purple shadows lay beneath her eyes, giving her a look of frailty and fatigue.

She and Claire led a very sober and uneventful existence at Charnwood, the one absorbed in her quiet happiness, the other in her quiet grief. But the bond of their friendship had held true throughout the differing fortunes which had fallen to the lot of each, and although for Jean there was inevitable additional pain involved in still remaining within the neighborhood of Stangle, it was counterbalanced by the comfort she drew from Claire's companionship.

Besides, as she reflected dispiritedly, where else had she to go? The Dover House would have been open to her, of course, at any time, but there she would be certain to encounter Blaise more frequently, and of late her principal preoccupation had been to avoid such meetings whenever possible. And she could not face Blaise's yet—alone! Some day, when Claire was married, she knew that she must brace herself to return there—to a house of dreams that would never come true now. But at present she shrank intolerably from the idea. She craved companionship—above all, the consoling, tender understanding which Claire, who had herself suffered, was so well able to give her.

The book that she had been reading earlier in the evening lay open on her knee, and her thoughts were with Claire now. She pictured her sitting next to Nick at dinner, her flower-like face radiant with unclouded happiness, and Jean was thankful to the very bottom of her heart that she was able to feel glad—glad that she was able to feel glad.

"Oh, Blaise, dearest of all—hush! Hush!" she checked him brokenly, with quivering lips. "I can't go with you. It wouldn't bring us happiness. Ah, listen to me, dear!" She came close to him and laid her hands imploringly on his arm, lifting her white, stricken face to his. "It would only spoil our love—to take it like that when we have no right to. It would smother and soil it, make it something different. I think—I think, in the end, Blaise, it would kill it."

"Nothing would ever kill my love for you," he exclaimed passionately. "Jean, little Jean, think of what our life together might be—the glory and beauty of it—just you and I in our House of Dreams!"

In every bone there is marrow and in every jacket a man.

Though the people should support the government, the government should not support the people.—Grover Cleveland.

Jean felt her heart contract as her eyes marked the changes wrought in him by the few weeks which had elapsed since she had seen him. His face was haggard as though from lack of sleep, and the lines on either side of the mouth were scored deep into the flesh. The mouth itself closed in a time line of savage misery and the stark bitterness of his eyes filled her with grief and pity, knowing how utterly powerless she was to help him or comfort him.

Distrusting her self-control, she snatched at its first conventional remark that suggested itself.

"I thought—I thought you and Neta were both dining at the Dover House," she said confusedly.

"Neta is there. I made an excuse. I came here instead."

Something in the curt, clipped

Tryon

A large assembly of friends of Mr. and Mrs. William Rogerson of Tryon, congregated at the Tryon Baptist Hall on Monday evening, May 23rd to tender "Amy and Bill" as they are familiarly known, a miscellaneous shower and to wish them the very best of luck in their married life.

The fun started early in the evening, everyone joining in the games and merriment. Shortly after the arrival of the bride and groom, they were placed in the seats of honor and two immense baskets filled with gifts were placed before the astonished young couple. The popularity of Amy and Bill was plainly seen as many expressed the opinion that they were well attended a shower, where their gifts were so numerous and costly. Miss Eva Stevenson read the verses accompanying the gifts, while Miss Emma Shamas handed them to the bride. Mr. and Mrs. Rogerson, although completely taken by surprise thanked the donors in a few well chosen words.

Mrs. Rogerson remarking that things did not look like depression there. After the presentation of the gifts, the youth and beauty of the assembly again played games until "time for eats". At a late hour everyone departed for their respective homes having spent an enjoyable evening and hoping that Mr. and Mrs. Rogerson will always tread through life a pathway strewn with roses.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter H. Bell and two small daughters were Sunday visitors to Mrs. Bell's home in Rose Valley, P. E. I.

Born to Mr. and Mrs. Lida Clark of Augustine Cove on Friday, May 6th, a son. Congratulations.

Miss Katy McDonald of Rose Valley, is spending a week in Tryon, the guest of her sister, Mrs. Walter Bell.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Wilfred Boulter of Charlottetown, spent last week end very pleasantly visiting relatives in Tryon.

The potato freighter "Nyhaven" which has been loading potatoes for the past few days for Mr. M. J. McIvor of Kinkora, left at Tuesday noon, having paid a little better than 15 cents per bushel. Many of the farmers took this opportunity of disposing of their surplus spuds. Another steamer is at present loading at Victoria and it is also receiving large quantities of potatoes.—D.

Prince of Wales Honors Aviatrix

LONDON, May 25.—(A. P.)—Mrs. Amelia Earhart Putnam, a new hat hiding her tousled tresses, was received alone by the Prince of Wales yesterday and "talked shop."

"We just did some ground flying," she said as she rode back to the United States embassy where she is staying. "He congratulated me warmly on my flight from Newfoundland and I told him the story of the flight."

For three quarters of an hour, Mrs. Putnam, here after a solo flight across the Atlantic, exchanged flying experiences with the Prince in a room at York House, while guardsmen in their red coats and busbies stamped noisily on their patrols in the courtyard of St. James Palace outside.

Her plan to visit Rome had been cancelled, she said, because the conference of trans-oceanic fliers there, which she had intended to attend, is ending Thursday.

Instead she will go to Paris for a few days. The French capital was her destination when she left Harbor Grace, Newfoundland, last Friday on her flight that ended after a series of hazards in the countryside of northern Ireland.

The Electrical Inspection Act 1932

For the information of the Public the following Sub-Sections taken from the Regulations of the Prince Edward Island Electrical Inspection Act, 1932, are quoted:

3. From and after the first day of June, 1932 every person, company, association or corporation wishing to do electric installation work, as provided in this Act, whether as additions to or changes in an existing electrical installation or as new electrical installation in the Province, must obtain, before commencing the work, a permit from the Board.

4. Every person, company, association or corporation who or which, after the first day of June, 1932 carries on business of, or undertakes or works at, the installation of electrical wires, conduits or apparatus for the transmission of electricity in, on or over any building for producing light, heat, or power, in this Province, as a contractor, or as a journeyman electrician or as an apprentice, must first obtain a license, as hereinafter provided, from the Board.

5. No public utility shall connect with their systems any electrical installation hereafter made in any building in this Province, for the purpose of supplying and producing therein light, power or heat, unless such electrical installation has been inspected and approved by the Board, or an Inspector appointed under the Act, and a certificate of acceptance has been issued by the Board for such purpose.

19. The materials, accessories and apparatus which are or which may be approved by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario's Laboratories, at Toronto, or by the Underwriters' Laboratories, at Chicago, or by a recognized Canadian Government Laboratory, shall be considered as approved for the purposes of this Act.
