Grey Roses

By PETER BENEDICT

"It was well worth the effort," said Jim, "in this case. This was revealing. If it was a puzzle, Hart looked at him as if he saw in him a rival to be annihilated, a discipline to be patronized, and a patron to be instructed, a courtier to be pressed, all at the same time; and he had said that the name of Jim Foley was not unknown to him."

They came to a deep sunken garden of rockeries and flower-beds and luscious lawns; and there in their beauty were the grey roses by their scores and hundreds, just as he had imagined them. Iris-coloured, mist-coloured like lavender bushes, a cloud of loveliness settled, as it were, out of the sunlight upon the walled garden. At sight of this multiplication of perfection they halted, Jim in contemplative delight, Hart in triumph, and as they stood at gaze, a woman walked out of the grey cloud, like Venus out of the sea, and came towards them. The first impression of her was of a very hesitant slenderness which moved along the paved paths like a mote of thistle-down or a speck of mist caught in a small breeze.

She was young, this woman, probably not so much as twenty-five, of medium height and very slim, with long creamy arms and a face pale and clear and delicately featured. Her hair was black and glossy fine, turned back like wings from the pearl of texture of her temples; and her eyes, which regarded the world with a languid willingness to please, were the deep rich colour of wood violets, lashed with silken black, large and luminous and for some reason strangely melancholy.

She was startlingly, painfully beautiful to see, but that was not in first time, and without warning, made the heart contract in astonishment. She came to them slowly, a slight smile curving her lips a woman doing what was expected of her, a mirror to the eyes that the source should be acceptable without question. Her large eyes looked from one to the other of them, and she smiled at the stranger.

"Allow me, my dear," said Austin Hart, "this is Mr. Foley, of whom I think you must have heard. Mr. Foley, this is my wife, Thea."

He turned his head and looked suddenly into the eyes of the woman named Vanhomrigh, you know — Thea Vanhomrigh.

A STRANGE PAIR

The girl said: "How do you do, Mr. Foley. I'm a milliner, like your wife, but I'm not in the business. I'm afraid this intrusion is without excuse," said Jim. "As a matter of fact, Mrs. Hart, your namesake drew me here. I wanted to come to see her, and you know."

"Mr. Foley saw the rose shown in London yesterday," explained Hart, in tones dry and haughty, and made a small caressing gesture towards her. "They're very beautiful, aren't they?"

"They're magnificent. I've been telling your husband as long as I can of no rose to compare with them."

"Oh!" She shook her head vaguely. "I don't know anything about the points of roses, you know. I just like these because they're good to look at."

"You know Dr. Wayland will be along to see you presently," he supposed it better. "I shall see you again, Mr. Foley. At dinner. You will stay, won't you? Well aware that he ought to decline, that she had made the invitation in full

Cancellation of Summer School At Crapaud

It is with deep regret that we must announce that the Church of England Summer School, to have been held at the Youth Centre at Crapaud, August 26th to 31st, must be cancelled. All arrangements have been made for meals and sleeping accommodations; a Staff had been engaged to give instructions and plan recreation. The number of those expected to attend was very satisfactory and no possible preparation had been omitted to make this School beneficial to body, mind and spirit; but, due to the fact of the cases of Polio in the neighbouring districts of Crapaud it was felt that in the best interests of all concerned, the holding of the School should be cancelled. We take this means of informing the Rectors and those young people who planned to attend the School of this decision, regrettable as it is, but it is little use to be wise after the event, and in this case, the old saying still holds good, "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure."

REV. F. DOUGLAS HENDERSON,

knowledge of her husband's disapproval. There was only one decent thing to do, and that was to view the garden and go. But for some reason he was not sure that he would do it.

As for the girl, Jim was to her a new face, a young face, a different voice at her table. Any other man, any woman, would have done just as well. She had asked him to stay because she was a prisoner in a walled garden, and he was a breath of free air from beyond the wall.

The gardener had told no lies about Austin Hart. Certainly he hoarded his treasure. No wonder her nerves were taut to breaking point, no wonder a doctor was needed to attend on her regularly. They threaded the maze of roses at leisure, pausing here and there to admire a particularly fine specimen or to remark upon the formation of bush and stem and bud. Their talk was all of roses, and the subject smoothed away for the time being all remembrance of that curious little scene between husband, wife and stranger.

They turned back towards the house at length. It was after seven o'clock, and the sunrays were beginning to slant warmly over the high wall, touching the tops of the roses and leaving their stems in purple shadows. The hall was dim and cool, and from a bowl of flowers in the shadows a gracious and mysterious scent was distilling strongly. Thea was coming down the stairs in company with a tall young man, not too tall, not too young to pass with Hart for a doctor rather than a man. Thirty-five, perhaps, or rather more, a well-built fellow, and not bad looking in a heavy way, with good eyes, deep set and dark and keen. His manner towards Thea appeared to be that of a firm but indulgent uncle.

"My dear Mrs. Hart," he was saying, "you must rest. I know you are feeling better. You are much better. But it won't do for you to presume on the improvement. You're highly-strung, and you mustn't let yourself live on your nerves. Take my advice, and so on taking things easy. I'll tell you when you can begin to take exercise again, but just now you must please trust me and do just as I say."

"Oh, I know I'm an awful nuisance to you," said Thea with a sigh, "but then I feel so well — And I'm so tired of being quiet."
