Confessions Of A Debutante

By RUTH A. ABELING (Copyright)

A STRANGE REQUEST

Jonathan had crumbled on the floor, a lighted candle in his hand. With the heavy fabric of my skirt I smothered the flame which was already beginning to eat into the carpet. Then I hurried through the house, calling Mercer. Together we got Jonathan to a couch.

The doctor was grave. "Very little chance for him, Mrs. Grey—very little!" he said. And that night, because he seemed to want me always within his vision, I sat at his bedside, beset with memories.

I was haunted by his thoughts. "That is the way with most of us; we take the wrong method of finding happiness!" I wondered vaguely what he had meant. "Most of us" who included himself? Had he not been happy? And then it came to me, suddenly, that he hadn't been! Couldn't have been! There had been no companionship between us, none of the affection marriage should mean.

To be sure he had missed that, missed it as much as I! How could he have been happy! And then—"apples of Sodom!" I understood then. The fruit in his hand had turned to ashes. The dream god had turned to dust!

It was pitiful. This great man who had conquered the financial world, who had made men cringe whose name stood for gold and strength and cleverness, had bumbled in the most important thing! And now his life was flickering out like that of any other ordinary failure. Futility his, his cunning, his cleverness. Futility—for it had not brought happiness.

I watched beside him until at length he slept. Then, with a warm robe drawn around me I slept on the couch until his fretful voice called again. Sometime, during the evening, I had found a strange new patience and tolerance, even sympathy.

The fretful requests and commands of my husband aroused no rebellion within me. My hands and feet seemed to move at his bidding with a sort of eagerness at which I wondered.

I wanted to please Jonathan! It was no last illness foolishness, but something born of genuine sympathy and understanding. I knew that he, too, had been tricked by glamour, the glamour of youth, even as I had been tricked by the glamour of gold!

Daylight came at length and found me still keeping vigil in my husband's room. When he was awake his eyes followed my every movement and they seemed to have softened and humanized.

To was toward noon, the sun was streaming into the room, when Jonathan called me to him. He took off his coat and the combination is in my check book—in the suit I had on!

Jonathan never had given me a part of his confidence before. I hardly knew what to say. "I guess it's time," he hesitated, "that you—should know." The words came with difficulty.

And then he looked at me oddly, intently, questioning. Finally the words came: "You won't marry again—when I'm gone?" slowly, "will you?" It struck me as tremendously tragic, this elderly man trying to keep the heart of youth! This man, who had grown old and childless, lighting candles at Christmas and stretching eager hands toward the heart of youth!

ing again at the motionless form. "Yes, Madame; I feared so, Madame! Shall I attend to things?" wondered if it were tears I saw in Mercer's eyes.

"If you will, Mercer." I said gently. And so it was all left to Mercer and I sought my room. Again and again I have felt those fingers gripping mine and then felt their hold loosen coldly. And I have heard that question which I was spared answering. Almost I am haunted!

Friday, December 28. The church where Jonathan's funeral was held was suffocatingly full. The streets outside were a crush of people with eager, staring eyes, trying to glimpse the remains of the man the world regarded as invincible. That man who died pleading weakly, for a promise which would give his dead fingers right to reach from their grave and hold on to the very heart of life! That man their hero!

And yet, I was glad to see those people there. I knew that it would please Jonathan. Mama rustled into the church and sat beside me in the heaviest and handsomest of mourning. She bent stiffly from the waist during prayer and dabbed her eyes frequently with me, suddenly, that he hadn't been! Couldn't have been! There had been no companionship between us, none of the affection marriage should mean.

To be sure he had missed that, missed it as much as I! How could he have been happy! And then—"apples of Sodom!" I understood then. The fruit in his hand had turned to ashes. The dream god had turned to dust!

Highest Education Needed In Nurses

TORONTO, July 4.—Highly selective processes to admit only the best qualified women to positions of responsibility as principals, teachers and supervisors of schools of nursing, as well as in the choosing of the student group, were advocated by Miss Ethel Johns, president of the Canadian Nurses' Association here.

Miss Johns also suggested the building up of strong schools of nursing closely connected with the best hospitals and possibly linked up with the universities.

"The standards for these schools would be set by the educational council of the Canadian Nurses' Association composed of representatives of all schools which branches of nursing," said Miss Johns. "Membership in this council should by no means be confined to nurses, I should include representatives of the field of general education and of hospital administrators, governmental authorities and the public whom we serve."

Miss Johns advocated co-ordination and strengthening of legislation concerning nurse practice and education with a view to the elimination of all schools which fail to measure up to the standards mentioned above.

The necessity for adoption of a sound financial policy to assure the provision of adequate facilities with respect to education, housing, health and recreation was stressed together with the establishment of post-graduate courses which are of real educational value and which are based on standards similar to those outlined for schools in general.

She arrived on the liner Majestic on which she had traveled tourist class. Her son, Samuel Insull, Jr., met her at quarantine. They planned to take a midnight train for Chicago.

Storm Destroys Fishing Gear

(C. P. Cable By Guardian's Special Wire) ST. JOHN'S, Nfld., July 4.—Fishermen of northern Newfoundland and Labrador were counting losses totalling thousands of dollars tonight in the wake of a terrific storm that raked their coasts for three days.

The schooner Baleska was ashore at Sand Hill Tickle, Labrador, and hundreds of traps had been destroyed within a few miles of the rocks where the little craft was being battered to pieces. Her crew had escaped to land but the schooner was regarded as a total loss.

Cracking out of the north just when the outport fishermen were in the midst of the cod, lobster and salmon season, the storm whipped the sea into fury and sent ravaging breakers into a dozen coastal communities.

Fishing gear was torn away and carried to sea or thrown along the coast. Fishermen at Flowers Cove lost 30 cod traps and their stages were blown down. At Cod Head, lobster, salmon and cod gear was swept away and nearly every man in the village lost his equipment.

"I first we were hardly encouraged for the men thought their organization was rigidly a men's affair. Gradually, through the merit of our work for Rotary, however, the women's organizations have grown in favor with the men and today we have their whole-hearted support and encouragement."

Ward Hours Too Long
 Reduction in the hours of ward training was one of the most immediate needs of the nursing profession, was advocated by Prof. E. Wallace of the University of Alberta.

ROTARY ATTRACTS WOMEN FOLK
 CAPE TOWN, SOUTH AFRICA, June 4 (CP).—Rotary attracts women immensely all over the world, but we still remain outside the chosen circle, said Mrs. Jean Harris of Chicago, wife of Paul Harris.
