THE CORNER HOUSE

Nancy Prindle cleared a chair for her visitor and went on packing dishes into a clothes basket. "You won't mind if I keep at work, will you?" she pleaded. "We expect to get all moved this afternoon. Don has a half day off and the van is coming at 2 o'clock."

The visitor, who was very little older than Nancy, and of the same order, bright, vivid, joyous, signed. "I hate to have you go—clear across the town," she said. "We've been such close neighbors. Oh, Nancy, I'm afraid you're not going to like it over there."

"Not like having a whole house to myself—and a yard with real rose bushes!" cried Nancy. "And since we've all the things we want, we've been married. Why, Helen, I shall like it."

"Oh, you'll like the place, but it's the neighbors, Nancy. I've been hearing about it. They're all people well known in the neighborhood. Why, they hardly pass the time of day with each other, they've lived there so long together, but all sorts of ill feelings and little feuds have germinated. And it's very worst of them all lived in the corner house, the house you're going to. She was a perfect terror."

"What did she do?" asked Nancy.

"Why she didn't do anything. She just lived by herself—except when down that sort of thing she never went into a neighbor's house, nor made anybody welcome in her house. The reputation she had for meanness—well, I don't know how you're going to help her living for it."

Nancy laughed. "Oh, Helen, you're trying to scare me. And you don't live among a tribe of half-bred savages. You don't know what it is to meet a fellow from pillar to post. Why, I've bought the house on Hurlingham street. I can't ever enjoy with you, and I've been over there and nothing is going to spoil it for me."

All this talk made very little impression on Nancy Prindle. She once she had a house of her own she did not care about neighbors. She would be so busy for a long time settling and putting things in order. She felt quite independent and that afternoon when she walked away from Bush street, carrying one provision basket and helping her husband with another, he laughed roodily to Helen, who waved to her dolefully. Helen was a dear and she had been a real comfort for the town was strange to Nancy, though home was home anywhere with Don, Nancy thought, as she looked up at the honest, pleasant face of her husband.

The corner house was very pleasant. Nancy planned her things about the rooms and planned to buy other things when they could afford it. Then there was the yard. There was room for a garage, as well as roses, and she and Don talked over the possibilities of a car. The Chandlers came over to dinner and they had a merry time. Nancy was really happy. It was all as imagined, this having a house of her own.

The fall weather, which had been perfect up to this point, turned suddenly into winter. Helen would not stay with her mother, who was ailing. The work of arranging the house was done and Nancy began to find that her new work did not keep her hands busy. She was no hand to push a broom, and she was not a good cook, even though she had much to do. She grew almost dreadfully bored. Don, who had been so busy, now had time to be with her. She was lonely as she had never been before in all her life. When she looked out of her window at the houses so close about her on every hand she felt a curious resentment for the apparent indifference of their inmates.

She was, however, not aware that the neighbors were all doing the same thing. They were all asking one day: "What any of the folks around here come to see you, Nancy?"

"They haven't yet. But they will. I shall make them." She almost cried at her truth.

"We're perfectly respectable nice young folks," she said to herself. "And we own our house. And I don't see why they can't accept it."

All this led to Nancy making a study of the neighbors with the result that she "got a line" as she expressed it, on the inhabitants. She found out from the telephone directory that Mrs. Jenkins lived opposite, with a pair of old maid sisters on one side of her and a busy young widow on the other. They looked as if they might be worth knowing, but they paid no more attention to Nancy and Don than if they were not in existence. Sometimes, if she happened to start right out and go to the door of the house at a moment's notice, she would find a note pinned to the door. "I'd risk but once I got in I'd make them like me. If they would only just get to know me the rest would be easy." A sob came. The house was her own, but she had no friends. "Why, if anything should happen to me I wouldn't dare ask one of them for a bit of help."

But nothing did happen to Nancy, though something did happen to Mrs. Jenkins, the fat old mistress of the house at the end of the street in front of the corner house, and that was when she was able to get up and make her way to the nearest door, which was Nancy's, and rattle the bell.

Nancy answered the bell on the wings of joy, but when she saw Mrs. Jenkins' white, scared face and heard her pant, she became startled and "Oh, you poor dear, come right in," she cried.

"I couldn't get on my feet, further than your home, and I had to get in somehow," said Mrs. Jenkins.

"I'm so sorry," regretted Nancy. "There, lie right down and I'll get you something." She couldn't do enough for old Mrs. Jenkins, who was not used to being made much of, and she tried to get that she did not recover quite as fast as she might. Mrs. Jenkins laid on the couch and let Nancy tuck up her feet and place pillows under her head. Suddenly she started up. "If you have a phone," she said, "I wish you'd call on Mrs. Jenkins in the yellow house opposite and have her come over here."

Wondering much Nancy obeyed. Within five minutes Mrs. Jenkins appeared. "Why, for Christ mass sake, what ails you Marah?" she demanded.

Old Mrs. Jenkins lay back on her pillows and laughed. "Nothing now," she said.

"Then what did you want me for?"

Mrs. Jenkins laughed still more, while Nancy stood by staring at the pair in amazement. "I wanted you to see what it was like to have a real neighbor, Fanny. I have, I had one in fifteen years." Nancy feared that the shock was affecting her guest. "If I had fallen down on your sidewalk I shouldn't have dared to go into your house," went on Mrs. Jenkins. "It's an awful thing to be neighbors and not neighborly."

"I don't know as I'm to blame. You've never been the most reasonable person in the world," retorted Mrs. Jenkins.

"We're all a lot of old grouches together, I guess," said Nancy. "But sit down, Fanny. Now that I've found a real neighbor I'm not going to be selfish. I'll share my with you. You'll find the corner house is quite a different place from what it used to be when Ellen Palmer lived in it. She got us all by the ears. Maybe this young lady will get it all on good terms again. I'm sick of pulling and hauling."

And now Nancy spoke. "In just twelve minutes I'm going to see Mrs. Jenkins," she said. "My husband doesn't know home, and you never saw Mrs. Jenkins, with her and me, Mrs. Jenkins, I'm going to have pickled pigs' feet."

"Pickled pigs' feet?" Mrs. Jenkins smiled. "Well, that's too big a temptation to be resisted, and any way, so long as Mrs. Jenkins and I have made up—Thank you very much, my dear."

Over the pigs' feet and a cup of tea the old ladies grew quite hilarious.

"My, this is a regular 'porky' feast," said Mrs. Jenkins. "Are you sure, Marah, you didn't fall out on purpose in front of Mrs. Prindle's door?"

"I'm not sure of anything except that you and I are good friends," said Nancy. "I'll be sure to call on you, Fanny, we ought to cooperate. We ought to join forces and give the biggest party this month. Looked like a good one, didn't it?"

And so that was how Nancy Prindle came to give a party to the neighbors. She didn't know, but they all came and after that even Nancy herself couldn't have wanted for a friendly place to live in that sort of Hurlingham street turned out to be.

It is not always in business that a woman is forced to give up her work on account of ill health. It is quite as often the woman who does her own work at home. When backaches and headaches drive out all ambition, when that leaning-down sensation attacks you, when you are nervous and blue, the one great help for such ailments is Lydia E.
