Banff

"the glad-hearted"

You can't resist it . . . that glad-hearted, exultant, play-spirit of Banff. You breathe it as you step off a crack train into a glistening world of high-flung peaks. You catch it as you sweep up the hill to that baronial castle of a hotel, step out onto its terrace where the world drops away below and the peaks close in above. You just feel like racing up those heaven-bent trails, plunging into that warm sulphur pool, dancing the night away . . . and you do! There isn't such another combination of scenic grandeur, exhilarating sport, and sublime luxury as Banff. But only 600 rooms—better see about yours, now. Ask

CHAPTER 21

THE DILEMNA

Dorothy walked in, just as Herbert, terrified by Lila's attack of weeping, was going to the telephone, for the second time, to call her.

She was looking pale and anxious; she wore a coat over her smock; her hair was disheveled.

"Has anything happened?" she asked breathlessly. "I—was talking to Lila when—"

Herbert looked intensely relieved.

"So it was you? I wondered who the person was who could have given Lila such a shock."

Dorothy's gaze darted to his face. She seemed perplexed by what she saw.

"What do you mean by 'shock'? she asked anxiously.

"Didn't you know? Lila fainted while she was talking to you."

Dorothy made for the stairs.

"Where is she? In her room?"

Herbert didn't follow her. He stood in the hallway at the foot of the stairs, frowning thoughtfully.

Was Dorothy telling the truth, he wondered, when she claimed that she had been talking to Lila; or was she merely trying to shield Lila? What could Dorothy Caine have said to send his wife into a dead faint?

Dorothy meantime, had found Lila, pale and listless, on her dressing-room couch. She locked the door, walked over to the couch, and knelt down, taking Lila's hands in hers.

"I'm fearfully sorry to have given you such a shock, but it had to be. I was frantic when you didn't answer, after I'd heard that terrific crash and found that the connection was broken. I came rushing down here as fast as I could get my car through the traffic. Lila how much does Herbert know?"

"Nothing," said Lila wanly, "yet."

There was a long and thoughtful silence. Dorothy's pretty brows were frowning.

"How—what did the cable say?" asked Lila finally, in a low voice.

Dorothy, her voice equally low, answered briefly:

"It was addressed to Miss Lila Latham and was sent from Paris. It said: 'Have practically risen from the dead. Am sailing tomorrow for home and you. Jack'."

Tears began to roll down Lila's cheeks.

"Oh, Dot, what am I going to do?"

Dorothy stroked her hands comfortingly.

"We'll find a way out, somehow."

"And I love Herbert so!" wailed Lila. "This is my punishment for being too happy. I had no right to be happy when Jack was dead, as I thought. Even if I didn't really love him, I should have been loyal to his memory. I should have kept that pledge we made."

Dorothy, sitting on the foot of the couch in the gathering twilight, rested her chin thoughtfully on one hand. After a silence, she said:

"What about Herbert? You think you wouldn't dare confess?"

"No, oh, no! Dot, you can't imagine what Herbert wouud be like, if he knew I'd ever been engaged before. He'd leave me instantly. You've no idea how jealous he is. I adore it, of course; it makes me certain that he loves me. But, if he ever knew, there'd been another man—"

She broke off, waited a moment, and added passionately:

"I'd die, if I lost Herbert."

"Well, then, what about Jack Farquahar?" suggested Dorothy practically.

"You mean, would he understand and not bother me?"

"He may have changed, you know, after all these years and the experiences he must have had."

Lila shook her head.

"I don't mean to sound frightfully conceited, but I don't think Jack is the sort who would change. He was very like Herbert, in certain ways; that is, he was jealous and sure of himself. If he wanted something, he'd get it. And I happened to be what he wanted. The very fact that he's coming home to me proves that he still loves me."

"Yes, it would seem so," murmured Dorothy absently.

"Dot, how on earth do you suppose he happened to come to life?" persisted Lila feverishly. "After all these years, it's perfectly incredible. And Dot," she added, stricken by another terrible thought, there's that insurance. I'll have to give it back to the government, somehow, and I haven't any earthly way of finding ten thousand dollars." She sighed despairingly. "And it's only three days since the whole horrible business got me into hot water with Herbert."

"But you explained it satisfactorily. Or rather, Herbert leaped to a satisfactory conclusion."

Lila made a wry face.

"Fortunately, yes. But it would be awful, if Uncle Dan should turn up some day. Oh, why did that stupid committee have to recognize me and write to me at Herbert's club?"

"But naturally your new home isn't listed yet," said Dorothy. "They found Herbert's name in the Social Register."

"Oh, Dot, if you keep on being sensible and explanatory, I'll have hysterics again!" cried Lila. "Think think, what I'm up against!"

"Do you know just what you are up against?" asked Dorothy, with sympathetic tolerance.

Lila gave her a pitying glance.

"Isn't it obvious? Here I am, married to a man I adore, a man madly jealous, who has asked me a hundred times if there'd ever been any one else in my life, and I've sworn there wasn't. And now the other man appears, expecting me to keep a pledge from which I'd thought his death had released me. And he'll hold me to it, if I know Jack Farquahar—and I rather think I do, worse luck!"

"Of course, there's just a chance that he mayn't," consoled Dorothy.

"Pray Heaven!" murmured Lila. After a moment, he said suddenly:

"Dot, did he say what ship he was sailing on?"

"The Caronia."

"Then you'll have to meet him, Dot. He mustn't be allowed to rush around town, trying to locate me."

Dorothy rose from the couch. Her face turned away, a faint white blur in the dusk.

"I'm sorry, Lila," she said quietly. "I'd do almost anything to make you happy. But—I won't meet your Captain Farquahar. I—I never want to see him."

She was gone, leaving Lila staring after her in amazement.

Teachers Federation In Annual Conference

WINNIPEG, July 26.—C. W. Laidlaw, B. A., principal of the Machray Junior High School, Winnipeg, was elected president of the Canadian Teachers Federation at the afternoon session of the ninth annual conference here today.

In addition to the election of officers the afternoon session considered the reports of the committees on professional training, and teachers certificates, interchange of teachers, parliamentary and legislative representations, examinations and tenure.

The other officers of the Association for the coming year are C. Braden Jelly, of Summerside, P. E. I. vice-president and Alderman M. J. Colwell of Regina, who was re-elected secretary treasurer of the organization.

Fifteen thousand people every year suffer the most tragic death imaginable—in fires, most of which could have been prevented.

The property loss runs into millions.

People are not as careful in handling fire as they should be, and as a result it is very necessary for property owners to secure insurance protection on their buildings, etc.

We offer a prompt insurance service.

FOX FARMERS

Feed lettuce to your foxes. —American fox ranchers are feeding lettuce largely and have wonderful results. Lettuce contains valuable vitamines very essential at this season. The wild foxes are able to choose their green food—but the ranch breed—many of them die, for the lack of this very important diet. We have been feeding lettuce for the last three years with the best result.

We are offering lettuce at a special low price to all fox ranchers

Lady Laurier Refloated

(Canadian Press)

HALIFAX, N. S., July 26. — The Canadian Government steamer Lady Laurier, which grounded in the Bras D'Or Lakes near St. Peter's canal last night was refloated this afternoon undamaged. Advices to this effect were received tonight by C. H. Harvey, local agent for the Marine and Fisheries department in a telegram from Capt. W. A. Robinson, master of the Lady Laurier. Capt. Robinson wired cancellation of plans that had been made to send the wrecking tug Reindeer to his assistance and said he was proceeding to Marble Mountain.
