DAUGHTERS OF MIDAS

BY ANNE AUSTIN

As Billy stood with the yellow envelope crushed to her bosom, her eyes dilated with a luminous joy, Clay rose and came slowly toward her, his sensitive face bleak with defeat.

"You haven't answered me Billy," he said in a low voice. "Do you love me? Will you marry me when your year is up?"

It was with difficulty that she broke the spell that Dal's message had laid upon her. But when she saw the bleak pain on his face and in his eyes, something of that feeling which had so moved her a few minutes before came back.

"I do love you, Clay, but—I can't marry you—I don't love you in that way—I wish to God I did!" she cried.

"I've asked you three times to marry me, Billy," Clay told her sadly. "And each time you have broken my heart all over again. Good-by."

During the longest thirty hours that Billy Wells had ever spent in her life Clay's face, bleak and tight with pain, kept coming between her and her rapturous visions of Dal Romaine. But when she met the dark-eyed, dark-skinned man of mystery on Monday at six, the ghost of Clay was banished.

"You adorable child!" he whispered softly, caressingly, as he stared at her with his drooping-lidded black eyes across the small table. "You're prettier than ever. Now, tell me everything. I can see you are bursting with news."

She told him the story of the robbery, of Nyda's and Banning's confessions, and of Nyda's banishment from the house of Curtis. When she had finished, Dal nodded.

"Did you know all the time that Nyda and Eddie were married?" Billy demanded, remembering with sudden vividness that scene at the Country Club. "Was that what you meant that night at the dance when you said that Eddie had put himself—and one other—into your power?"

"Of course!" His smile broadened to frank amusement. "And equally of course I did not use my power. I had thought of exposing Nyda if she continued to make life unpleasant for you, but—I couldn't quite do it."

"You're good, Dal!" Billy whispered. "Now tell me all about yourself. Oh, how I've missed you, darling!"

"And how I've missed you!" he murmured fervently. "But there's nothing to tell, dear heart. Just business—sordid business. I'll be glad when we can get away from this cross American civilization and go home—to India."

"Oh, yes, India!" Billy murmured vaguely. "You know, Dal, when I am with you I can believe in India—believe that it calls me to some strange destiny—but when you're away, I lose it all!"

"Then I shouldn't be away," he smiled. "I won't leave you again, dear. Well, now that Nyda's gone, who's the prime favorite with Daddy Curtis? Is Winnie still playing her part of adoring daughter?"

Billy looked up from her salad, her eyes wide and startled. Did Dal know about the strange contest which was to end in T. Q.'s choosing a daughter? "Why—what do you mean, Dal?"

"Why look so startled, darling?" he laughed at her. "Nyda stole the family jewels, but Winnie plays a neater game. Don't tell me you haven't seen what her game is!"

"Her game? Billy insisted blankly. No, he did not know! Of course he didn't! How could he?"

"If you're such an adorable little innocent as not to know, I'm not going to destroy your illusions by telling you," he teased her.

Dal drove her home in the cream-colored roadster, but he refused to come in. "No, Aunt Lucia would be hurt if she knew I had seen you first. I'll telephone her tonight and get her to ask me to dinner, if you think old T. Q. won't be too disgustingly wide with me. You know he doesn't like me."

Evidently Mrs. Meadows thought that T. Q.'s likes and dislikes were of very little importance in his own house, for Dal received his invitation to family dinner and that invitation was followed by another for a real dinner party for the Monday following Dal's return to Colfax.

By placing Dal Romaine on her right at the festive table, Mrs. Meadows indicated that she considered her nephew the guest of honor. That Ralph Truman, Bruce Kruger, Gil Warburton, and his father, Presley Warburton, T. Q.'s lawyer, regarded the guest of honor with cold, unfriendly eyes, and spoke to him as little as possible, apparently had no effect upon the unusually exuberant spirits Dal answered negligently.

"I do love you, Clay, but I can't marry you."

"Los Angeles?" Dal repeated, as if puzzled. "Don't you remember being there this winter?" Ralph asked carelessly. "I saw you in the lobby of the Alexandria in January. I was there on business for the factory." "That odd emphasis on the word 'business' brought a flush of anger to Billy's cheek, but Dal Romaine seemed entirely unafflicted.

Christus Of Passion Play Returns To Oberammergau

MONTREAL, June 16.—Next Saturday at daybreak, a boy will sail from Montreal on the White Star liner Regina—in tourist third cabin. To the majority he will be just "a boy" but to those who know he will be Anton Lang, Jr., son of Anton Lang Sr., a humble potter of Oberammergau, who is world famous for his portrayal on three occasions of the Christus in the Passion Play. And Anton Lang, Jr., too has played a part in the Passion Play.

The young man has been in Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass., for a year and he is returning, at the express wish of his famous father, with William M. Beale, Manager of Beale Tours, Chicago, who is a friend of the Lang family in Oberammergau.

He is going home on vacation, probably to stay, when he will be able to show the results of his western training because now he speaks English perfectly although two years ago he could not utter a syllable of this language.

The history of the Passion Play is enshrouded in pathos. In 1633 Caspar Schuchler sinned in the little German village, by breaking quarantine regulations and 8.4 per cent of the population died. The living vowed that if the curse was lifted they would faithfully perform the Christus Passion once every ten years in token of their everlasting gratitude. The descendants of the survivors have kept their word and young Anton Lang, who is returning to his native village, by way of England, on the Regina, has helped in this work.

The boy's father who follows his trade as a potter will long be remembered for his impersonation of the Christus which has attracted such attention that, at one time, a New York syndicate offered him 1,000,000 gold marks if he would come to America and lecture on the play. But he refused, preferring to mould the clay with his hands rather than the public mind with the simple eloquence of his words.

The play is performed once every decade, between May and September. Each performance lasts eight days, at 8 a. m. and closes at 6 p. m., with a rest between 12 noon and 2 p. m. and the entire text is given in German.

when coffee was being served in the drawing room.

"I'll be glad to play a little later," she told him. She could not explain that so long as Winnie Shelton and Dal Romaine were whispering together in a corner of the great drawing room she could not bear to leave.

It seemed like hours to her before Winnie excused herself and slipped from the room. Dal did not faintly to Billy's side, as she had prayed that he would, but stopped instead at Constance Bradley's chair. Billy waited for a few more minutes, then with a flashing smile that hid the ache in her heart, she murmured to T. Q. that she was ready to play for him.

She went to the music room across the hall to get her violin, but as she was reaching for the case, a slight noise, as of a stuck drawer being tugged at, came faintly to her from the library adjoining. The first thought in her mind, filled as it was with memories of the recent robbery, was that a thief was plundering T. Q.'s desk. Without giving herself time to think of possible injury to herself, she flung open the door between the music room and the library.

Winnie Shelton was seated at T. Q.'s desk, a blue-backed, legal-looking document in her hands, when the noise of the opening door caused her to spring to her feet. When she saw that it was Billy who was regarding her with surprised, questioning eyes from the doorway, Winnie's lovely little face which had been chalky white under the strong light of the desk lamp, became suffused with angry color.

"So you're spying on me, too!" she cried, with passionate rage. "You drove poor Nyda from the house, and now you're after me, aren't you? But—I'll fix you! I swear I'll ruin you if you tell T. Q. Just try it!"

As she raged, she thrust the legal document into the drawer from which she had taken it, and Billy had the odd conviction that her fingers drew back from contact with that document as if it had burned them. Even then she did not suspect what that document was, nor why Winnie's face had been so ghastly pale as she read it. (To Be Continued)

Sheer Frocks and Women's Hygiene

New way safer—discards like tissue By ELLEN J. BUCKLAND Registered Nurse

THAT filmy gowns and women's oldest hygienic problem now go safely together is a fact millions of women are learning. Old-time sanitary "pads" with their worries and dangers are giving way to the utter protection of a new way called Kotex.

Kotex discards as easily as tissue. Thus no laundry, no embarrassment of disposal. Five times as absorbent as ordinary cotton "pads," one may now dance, motor, go about for hours with h never a doubt. Also deodorizes; thus ending all fear of offense. Obtain at any store without embarrassment simply by saying "Kotex." Box contains 12. Be sure you get the genuine. Only Kotex itself is "like" Kotex.

Honor For War Dog

(By British United Press.) FLORENCE, June 14.—The Florence Society for the Protection of animals has conferred a gold medal on Nino, a magnificent wolfhound, for distinguished services both on the Italian front and in Libya.

Nino was captured near an Austrian outpost during the Italian advance beyond the Piave in the autumn of 1918. He attached himself to Lieut. Vincenzo Baglioni of the "Arditi" (storm-troops) and became noted for his extraordinary courage and intelligence. He followed his master into the thick of several engagements and was wounded in an eye by a shell splinter.

After the occupation of Vittorio Veneto, Nino proved of the greatest help in rounding up Austrian deserters who were in hiding in the neighbourhood and harassing the population by brigandage. He showed unflinching flair in discovering their tracks and unearthing them.

In 1919 Nino accompanied Lieut. Baglioni to Africa and took part in the Libyan campaign. On one occasion when his master, wounded in the hand, was on the point of drowning off the coast of Garasesch, Nino jumped into the sea and rescued him. The gold medal was solemnly presented to Nino before a large and enthusiastic audience. —When Holloway's Corn Remover is applied to a corn it kills the roots and the callous comes out without injury to the flesh.
