BROKEN WINGS

CONTINUED

Suddenly she came to a little clearing and stopped to look about her. Through the trees came the sound of Bill's voice. "They're right at the edge Kitty, you've passed them." Then when she did not reply, "Kitty, Kitty! You mustn't go in there. Come back!" Like one possessed Kitty began to run, through the trees, stumbling across a brook, skirting dense undergrowth, farther and farther from that hateful voice. It died away behind her. Still she ran on, ran until her breath came in gasps and she sank down on a fallen tree trunk, amid the startled stillness of the virgin forest.

A NEW RESOLVE

When she had caught her breath. Katherine got to her feet again. She had fled from the beach where the wrecked Falcon lay on an impulse. She was in wild rebellion against Bill and Bill's orders and she had not cared at the time what happened to her, if only she could escape from his hateful presence. Now, as she looked about the cool depths of the trees and bushes, a plan took form in her mind. She would explore the island. Perhaps she would find a place where she could stay alone. At any rate, she would know more about the situation than she had known before, and exploring the island would be a far pleasanter way of spending the day than carrying wood for Bill. There was light ahead of her and she made her way toward it, the trees growing thinner as she proceeded. A flash of wings in the treetops betrayed a bird of brilliant plumage and Katherine gave an exclamation of pleasure. She followed the flight of the bird with her eyes and saw it light on the branches of a short storky tree near the clearing. There it sat for a moment and then flew to the ground and began pecking industriously at something underneath the tree.

Full of curiosity Katherine followed it. The bird flew away with a squawk as she approached, so she picked up what it had been feeding on. It was a melon-like object, heavy, and with a thick rind. Looking up, Katherine saw the tree was burdened with similar fruit. "Melons on a tree," she said aloud. "I wonder if this is something we could eat."

She poked tentatively at the rind and then tried to bite into the "melon." Her mouth was filled with raw starchy flesh and she hastily spit it out. "Doesn't taste much like a melon," she reflected. "Still, it must be something edible or the birds wouldn't come here."

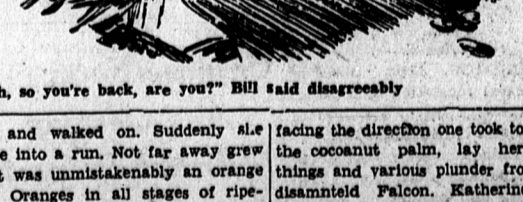

She discarded the melon-like object and walked on. Suddenly she broke into a run. Not far away grew what was unmistakably an orange tree. Oranges in all stages of ripeness grew on its branches and half-rotten ones covered the ground beneath. With a cry of delight Katherine picked a large yellow globe, half peeled it, and thrust a whole section into her mouth. Once more she was doomed to disappointment, for it was sour and bitter and puckered her tongue. She wondered hastily if she had eaten something poisonous, but was reassured by seeing that many of the fruit were half eaten, gnawed by animals from the forest behind her. She chose another large orange, deciding to take it back to camp. Perhaps Bill would know what it was. Free of the trees, she walked more rapidly and soon came again to a sand beach. She had crossed the island, and in a kind of despair stood looking for the vastness of the water that stretched before her. At the right was a hill and this she climbed, wishing now for the shoes she had left behind. Her feet hurt, her legs were scratched by the brambles, and the sand, which persisted even to the crest of the hill, irritated her skin. At the top of the hill grew a palm tree, standing like a sentinel alone.

This was where Bill had found the cocoanuts and Katherine could see faint tracks leading to its base. Several ripe nuts lay on the ground and as Katherine turned one over she was startled by the quick flight of some small animal. Clinging to the trunk and regarding her with startled, wistful eyes was a female monkey. On the ground, clamoring for its mother, was a baby monkey, no larger than a kitten. Apparently the mother wanted her child again but did not dare come down for it. Katherine stooped and picked the tiny creature up in her arms. Instantly the mother set up a beseeching chatter, but Katherine did not heed her. She was entranced with the tiny creature and laughed at its efforts to nip her fingers with its sharp little teeth. "I'll take it back and make a pet of it," she decided.

Shading her eyes with one hand she made out a thin column of smoke, Bill's fire. "I'll go back around the beach," she said aloud. Then to the tiny monkey, "Come along, Peanuts, I'll take you home." More than once she was tempted to abandon the little creature. It wriggled and slept by turns, seeming to grow quieter the longer she held it. The mother had followed her for some distance, but finally seemed resigned to the fate of her infant and raced back to the coconut palm tree. Katherine toiled on, longing for some shade, and finding none. It was long past noon when she finally came in sight of the Falcon.

There was no sign of Bill, and she hoped he was worried about her. "Maybe he's gone to hunt for me," she thought. But the sight of two completed huts, one on either side of the big rock, showed how he had spent his time since she left. Anyway, I didn't carry up his old branches. Outside of the first hut, the one

"Oh, so you're back, are you?" Bill said disagreeably

442 of the 451 important Hollywood actresses use Lux Toilet Soap

BETTY BRONSON, Warner Brothers' star, in the luxurious marble bathroom built in Hollywood just for her charming youthfulness. She uses Lux Toilet Soap not only in her bathroom, but in her dressing room on location—wherever her pictures are being made.

The next time you see her in a close-up, notice how smooth this daintily fragrant white soap keeps her skin.

She says about Lux Toilet Soap: "A star must have smooth skin for the close-up. I find this lovely soap is wonderful for my skin."

"A smooth skin is a star's most prized possession," says JOSEPHINE DUNN, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer star. "Lux Toilet Soap keeps my skin perfectly smooth."

stand why until she noticed that the tide was far out, leaving a broad expanse of white sand turned up to the sun.

Cross and tired, she went back to camp. Bill and the monkey still slept and she decided to go up the fresh-water stream for a bit and bathe her feet. She followed it into the shade of the trees and sat on its flat bank, soaking her feet and idly splashing water over her arms, burned red and blistered in places by the sun. The water made her feel better, but she realized the folly of her morning trip when the extent of her sun blisters was evident. "Golly, but they hurt," she said aloud, touching the skin of her shoulder gingerly. She smeared cold cream over them and wondered what she would look like after a week of this.

"Can't have my hair trimmed—good chance to let it grow. I'll turn absolutely black in the sun. My feet will get tough. My poor finger nails they're all broken now, and black! Heavens, how black they are!" She leaned back and fell asleep. An hour later she awakened from her nap. The sun was smiting and she lay a few minutes in the shade thinking of the day. "I suppose I might as well be more pleasant. After all, we've apparently got to be here for a few weeks and the brute means well enough." She took a resolve to be more agreeable. She might even help him now and then. "I can tell him about the melon tree, and the oranges, only I left my orange back under the palm tree. And I suppose since there are so many birds in that part of the woods, I might find some nests with eggs in them."

Comforted by her resolution, she started back to camp. "I hope there's something besides those beastly clam for dinner." She felt quite virtuous as she came near the huts and was unpleasantly startled by the uproar that greeted her.

The monkey, tiring of solitude, had crawled around to Bill's side of the rock. Long, it had investigated Bill by scratching a good-sized piece of skin off his left ankle. Bill was holding the ankle and swearing at the little beast.

SMOOTH SKIN is a perpetual attraction," says Allan Dwan, famous director—and sums up what 39 foremost Hollywood directors have learned from the movies. "The kind of rose-petal skin which can pass the test of the close-up is the kind of beauty that gets the American public every time," he goes on to say.

It is for this reason that 9 out of 10 screen stars use Lux Toilet Soap. They have found that it keeps their skin satiny and soft—always. And all the great film studios have made this white fragrant soap the official soap in their dressing rooms.

TOUR OF CANADA AMAZES EUROPEAN SCIENTISTS
Several hundred physiologists from European universities who were entertained in Toronto from Sunday night to Tuesday afternoon, said they had been much impressed with the Canadian National Exhibition and with Canada as a whole. They have come here on a tour of North America in connection with the International Physiological Congress in Boston, primarily to see the University of Toronto.

Prof. A. E. Aberhalden, of Halle, Germany, said he spoke for the delegates when he expressed surprise in what he had seen in Canada. "I don't think there is any product that you do not or cannot produce here," he said.

Prof. R. Noyns, of Utrecht, Holland, declared the vastness of the country and the fields of grain left everlasting pictures on his mind. Some ideas were carried away from the exhibition for talks in Austria by Prof. A. Jarisch of Innsbruck. "It is the most remarkable exhibition I have ever seen in my life," he remarked.

Prof. V. E. Henderson, University of Toronto, saw that the visitors were entertained, and was thanked for his attention.
