CHAPTER XXVIII

To a woman who has loved strongly, loving is almost a necessity. And from the very first I had loved Robert strongly, but with a certain reserve that I could not overcome. Had I married at 20 instead of 25, I would probably have been more outspoken in my feelings for other things, as well as in regret to other things—our manner of living, etc.

It was hard for me to broach the subject of my work. Beginning with Mary Ryan, everyone had made me feel I was in the wrong. I myself believed I was doing everything for the best—not entirely on my own account either but because of Robert.

"Robert, do you feel that I should give up my position?" I asked, "and that we should try to live on what you can earn?" "I was looking straight at him as I spoke and there came into his eyes a peculiar gleam—just for a moment. But before I had finished it was gone, and his face wore the same quiet expression to which I was so accustomed."

"That's a Yankee trick, answering by asking a question yourself. I want to know what you think." "I want you to be happy, Gerry. You know how little I earn. Unless you could be happy living as we would have to live I would far rather you went on at the shop, and having what you want."

"There! I knew that was how you felt about it. But your aunt was so sure you would be tempted to do wrong because you had no home that I had almost determined to wash dishes and cook for you in some cheap place."

"He had flushed when I spoke of temptation, but I had not given it a thought beyond feeling he was annoyed that his aunt thought him so little worthy of trust. I loved him so genuinely and my (time and mind were so engaged with my work when not with him, that I had no time for doubt, save when I had a shadow of one would creep in when he had been with Marion Hovey."

"Aunt seems to have very little confidence in me" he said after a moment. "Oh, I don't think she meant just you, when she talked. She seems to think all men rather weak, and that it is a wife's duty to see they are not led into temptation. She didn't say a word about a wife having any temptations."

"Suppose she knew you were too busy earning to be tempted. The bitterness in Robert's voice penetrated even my stupidity as regarded money matters. "Why, Robert Meredith! Aren't you ashamed to talk like that? You know that just as soon as you get a larger salary I shall be glad to play lady, and that it is only fair that until you do we use what I earn for our living. Have I ever said one word about earning more you have told her."

"No," the flush on his face deepened, "but you do. You're not saying anything doesn't alter the fact. You are paying aunt's expenses too, and."

"She doesn't know that unless you have told her." "No, and I am too much of a coward to tell her. It is too humiliating. Yet I allow myself to be humiliated not only in that, but in many other ways. It's too bad you married me, Gerry. I thought I too bad I ever wanted to marry. If I am satisfied, you shouldn't kick. That is unless you—regret marrying me."

"I wanted to make you happy—but—" "You do when you are yourself and don't fuss about foolish things. You are sure to advance you soon if not, you can go with someone else. I was positive it was the fact that others had been advanced and their salaries raised that bothered Robert; not that I worked, or that we lived in a boarding house."
