Patriot Challenges Globe's Accuracy

The local Liberal organ, in an anonymous contribution elevated to the dignity of a double-column front page article, challenges a statement quoted in a recent issue of The Guardian that the loss of Canadian population during the Mackenzie King regime was over 1,355,000. It suggests that these figures "are largely based on estimates of the population and naturally the estimates are highly colored before they drip from the pen of the editor." If this be so, The Patriot should address its complaint to its own leading party organ, the Toronto Globe, which on June 9th last carried the statement from which The Guardian figures were quoted. This statement appeared editorially and read as follows:

"Statistics from The Globe's Ottawa correspondent showing the trend in population illuminate one of Canada's great problems. The latest official estimate given of the population is 9,796,000 persons, the last census, taken in 1921, placed it at 8,788,000. This is an increase of slightly more than 1,000,000. The natural increase in the same period was 1,233,756, and immigrants entering the country totalled 1,130,659. If all immigrants had remained and the natural increase had been retained, the population would be 11,152,435. ACCORDINGLY, THERE WAS A LOSS IN THE NINE-YEAR PERIOD OF 1,355,635 PERSONS—MORE THAN EITHER NATURAL INCREASE OR IMMIGRATION."

Miss Irene Warren, teacher at Covehead, is spending her vacation at the home of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. George Warren, Cherry Hill.

Miss Agnes Clements was a visitor to Mount Stewart recently.
