HARDIE SPRAYERS

HARDIE Peoria Endgate Fertilizer Sower

The "Peoria" is easy to operate. Fits on the ordinary farm wagon without removing the tail board. Attached in five minutes. No holes to bore—no cleats to attach. There is absolutely no chance to split out wagon cleats. Spreads evenly 18 feet wide from 400 to 10000 pounds per acre.

Has Only One Half the Gears, Fans, and Chains Necessary on Other Machines

Spreads close to the ground eliminating wind waste. Handles either wet or dry material. Light draft, and so simply and strongly constructed that it will last longer in a fence corner, than most machines last under cover.

Easier to attach! Easier to operate! A more even spread! Fast work, and long life!

It Costs Less Money To Own!

We invite everyone to come in and see this Peoria Fertilizer Sower.

"Jealous Hearts"

CHAPTER 10.

THE TEMPTRESS

"Heaven! Why can't she let me alone!" Tony demanded savagely, between his teeth, as he paced up and down the garden after dinner, smoking a cigarette.

From the drawing-room that opened on the terrace, he could hear Elinor's mocking voice, his young wife's happy laughter, and, occasionally, the rumble of his father's well-bred voice.

Colonel Deering was in his element, with two pretty girls to listen to his anecdotes. Elinor played up to him shamelessly. Elderly men bored her, but she had taken pains to be particularly charming to Colonel Deering while his son was off honeymooning with her adopted sister. She didn't trouble to ask herself why. Perhaps it was solely because the Colonel and young New-Kettridge were the only two males who were summering at home that season, and Elinor couldn't bear to be without masculine attention.

Colonel Deering had urged her to come to tea to welcome the honeymooners, and he had been equally insistent upon her remaining for their first dinner at home. So Elinor sat at the table between him and Tony and was equally gracious to them. If her strange, heavy-lidded glance rested more frequently and speculatively upon Tony, no one noticed it. Certainly not Millicent, radiant in her new-found happiness and her joy at her home-coming. Nor the Colonel, playing host with courtly grace.

But Tony knew it. He was flamingly conscious of her eyes, of her presence, of the unforgettable fragrance of her. He avoided meeting her gaze when he addressed her, which was seldom. He declined coffee in the drawing-room on the pretext of having to see the chauffeur about certain repairs to the car, and escaped to the garden.

But he'd scarcely taken a step along the path before he felt her beside him, heard her well-remembered voice.

"I'm going with you Tony," she told him, an undercurrent of laughter in her voice. "I want to see how the car looks after the long trip. Remember, I warned you that that pet bus of yours would never stand up on a mountain road. Now I'm going to crow over you!" He swung round to her, his face white and tired in the light of a crescent moon.

"Go back to the house," he said rudely. The drooping lids lifted, her eyes opened wide—not with surprise, but with amusement.

"Rather edgy, aren't you, Tony, dear?" she mocked. He winced under the old, meaningless (for her) endearment. "I beg your pardon. I—I am a bit tired. We've driven pretty steadily the last few days, and I had the wheel myself."

She patted his arm. "Of course, I understand, Tony, will you never realize that I'm not a complete idiot? I understand—pretty nearly everything." She didn't say it boastfully. It was a plain statement of fact. Elinor believed it herself and, curiously enough, she made others believe it, too.

He ignored this and glanced back toward the lighted windows of the drawing-room that opened upon the terrace.

"Don't you think Millicent and Dad will be waiting coffee for you?" he asked significantly.

She chuckled softly. "What a polite way to tell me that you don't want my company!" He was silent.

"Tony," she drew closer, "aren't you ever going to forgive me for doing the one and only right thing? You've scarcely spoken to me since that afternoon when I told you to marry Millicent. Tony, dear, have I made you miserable? I'd have made you more so, if I'd married you."

"You have made me miserable," burst from him, before he could mislead himself. "You've made me miserable to think that I ever went to Millicent in the spirit you suggested. She is sweetness and goodness itself. I am a man to be envied, with such a wife."

Elinor smiled confidently. "And now, that that's off your chest, you can tell me whether you forgive me."

"Forgive you?" he echoed grimly. "I have everything to thank you for."

Again she smiled. She was not deceived. She said, lightly, carelessly: "Good! You can't imagine how it worried me—the fear of your displeasure."

He flushed angrily. "Sarcasm is rather cheap for you, Elinor."

"But it wasn't sarcasm," she told him, serenely. "I really meant it. Think how awkward it would be for all of us, living under the same roof, if you and I were on the outs. Somebody would be sure to notice it and wonder why."

Free Yourself of Constipation

"Fruitatives" has done it for thousands

MRS. W. WALKER

Prince Albert, Sask.—"I suffered for years from constipation and all remedies I tried proved useless. I read about "Fruitatives" and decided to try them. My constipation is now completely gone and I honestly say that "Fruitatives" is the best remedy for this complaint."—Mrs. W. Walker.

"Fruitatives" is made only of the intensified juices of fresh ripe fruit and tonics. It cleanses the system, naturally, purifies the blood and supplies strength to bowels, stomach, liver and kidneys, to function without daily medicine. Try it, 25c and 50c a box everywhere.

"You have made me miserable," burst from him, before he could mislead himself. "You've made me miserable to think that I ever went to Millicent in the spirit you suggested. She is sweetness and goodness itself. I am a man to be envied, with such a wife."

Elinor smiled confidently. "And now, that that's off your chest, you can tell me whether you forgive me."

"Forgive you?" he echoed grimly. "I have everything to thank you for."

Again she smiled. She was not deceived. She said, lightly, carelessly: "Good! You can't imagine how it worried me—the fear of your displeasure."

He flushed angrily. "Sarcasm is rather cheap for you, Elinor."

"But it wasn't sarcasm," she told him, serenely. "I really meant it. Think how awkward it would be for all of us, living under the same roof, if you and I were on the outs. Somebody would be sure to notice it and wonder why."

He had stopped dead in the path. "Living under the same roof? What do you mean?"

"Why, didn't Millicent tell you?" she asked casually. "But, of course, she had so little time—we talked so late over tea that she had to rush to change for dinner. Carver Hall, you see, is being completely renovated. Uncle Dan let it run down shockingly. The drains—oh, everything needs repairing. Aunt Het's going to visit some relatives in Georgia, and I—well, the house is simply impossible, with workmen all over the place and the baths and kitchen out of commission. So your father has kindly invited me to stay with you at Lynnwood. Of course, I waited, till Millicent got back to accept, because it's really her place to ask me."

Tony was speechless, and Elinor, with a swift glance toward the drawing-room windows, cried: "Oh, the coffee's come. I must run."

She left him alone. The interview had accomplished a double purpose. It had assured her that she still had power over him. It had revealed to him that, wife or no wife, his infatuation for Elinor was a living, consuming flame.
