CHAPTER XI

After supper Kester ensconced himself behind a magazine while Eleanor sat drawing curtains on the page of a ledger, searching the wall in front of them for some crack for escape. They did not need a great deal of money. If Kester had not neglected the interest on his notes since long before they went to the bank last January they would have needed still less.

She went on drawing circles. Their payment on the principal would not be due until the following fall. Eight thousand dollars would take care of the interest this year, though it would not leave a penny to pay for the fertilizer they had bought, nor the equipment, nor any of their long-standing bills. Eleanor jabbed her pencil into the paper so hard that the point snapped. She sprang up.

"Where are you going?" Kester asked.

"To get my keys. I'll show you." By the time she had said it she was at the door. She dashed upstairs to get her keys and a flashlight and down again to the vault that had been built under the house for the safeguard of valuables. With the aid of the flashlight she looked around.

Kester had said every teaspoon in the house was carrying all it could stand, which was an exaggeration. There were some things nobody had thought to mortgage: a few bottles of priceless liquor put here by a race that had understood the refinements of good living, and numerous bits of jewelry worn by dead ladies. Some of it she had worn herself on important occasions. Eleanor took the bottles down and pushed aside the cobwebs so she could see their labels. She knew very little about ancient liquors, but anything that could not be replaced was worth money. She knelt down the dust blackening her skirt, and began unlocking the old safe, constructed long ago to be opened with a series of keys. Groping in the half-darkness, she found a silver cup given to some Lorne baby of a past generation. She found some earrings, long and heavy for pierced ears, several brooches, a jeweled butterfly apparently made to hold up a lady's curls, a medalion with a lock of a baby's hair on one side and on the other a space that looked as if it might have been meant for a picture. The space was set within a circle of diamonds.

Holding these and other treasures jumbled together in a bag she made by gathering up her skirt, Eleanor unlocked the safe. She left the jewelry in her room, and without pausing to wash her blackened hands she picked up the flashlight again and went to the attic. It was full of furniture, mahogany and rosewood that were merely odds and ends at Ardeith but that would be costly antiques in the shop windows along Royal Street in New Orleans.

As she came down she saw Kester in the upper hall looking for her. "Eleanor, what have you been doing?" he demanded. He looked her up and down and burst out laughing. "Your hair is full of cobwebs and you're black from head to foot."

"Come in here," she opened the door of her bedroom. "Kester, do you know we've got enough salable stuff in this house to set an antique dealer mad? I'm going to bring one up from New Orleans."

Kester was amazed. He was, she guessed after a few minutes, shocked. It had never occurred to him that the treasures of Ardeith were separable from it any more than the columns that held up the roof. He looked at the silver and jewelry she had brought from the vault, and listening to her description of what else they could part with. Now and then he shook his head in wondering protest.

They took the jewelry to New Orleans the next day and left it there for appraisal. After consideration, Eleanor told Kester they need not actually sell it, as the bank would probably accept it as security for the interest of their notes, and the reminder cheered Kester so that he submitted to her unsavory choice of a dealer in antiques to look at their discarded furniture.

The dealer smelt like lard. His hair was greasy, his face was greasy, even his voice had a well-oiled sound. Cameo, who met them at the station with the carriage, gave their visitor a glance of distaste all the more eloquent because he abated not one jot of the silent respect with which he waited upon any guest to Ardeith. The dealer whistled as the carriage drove down the avenue and gave voice to some profane admiration. When they went indoors he looked around, estimating the cost of everything within his vision.

"Swell layout you got here," he observed. "Now where's the stuff you want me to look at?" Eleanor had the servants move it all into a back room downstairs. Kester looked on, speaking only when he had to answer a question. But now that she was actually doing something, Eleanor was enjoying herself. Matching her wits with someone else's or triumph, for she was good at it; they dickered and argued, and when they agreed on a price for anything she wrote it down in a notebook. "You sure know what you're up to, don't you, Mrs. Lorne?" the dealer remarked at length. "What you go total for this?"

"Two thousand one hundred and forty-two dollars."

BABIES MAY SQUALL AS PARENTS WORSHIP

NOTTINGHAM, England, Aug 15 - (CP) - Babies and young children may play and make as much noise as they like, in a specially equipped nursery in Addison Road Congregational church while their parents attend the service.

The nursery was devised by Rev. Anthony Green to counteract a falling off in the attendance of married couples. In future babies will play in the nursery and be looked after during services by members of the Youth Fellowship League.

"They will also get their orange juice," said Mrs. Green.

Only two-thirds of the people of the world are enumerated by census.
