MARRIAGE SCALES

By MILDRED BARBOUR

LOVELY EVENINGS

After another day spent in a futile round of social engagements, Mariana looked wearily forward to the evening at home with Charles. Usually, four or five nights out of the seven, they dined out and played bridge or mah jong afterward, or went to a dance. Charles didn't dance. He could, but he was too uninterested in it to keep up with the latest steps. Mariana, on the other hand, was passionately devoted to it and fumed because, in attending a dance with Charles, she was always being asked apprehensively if she would be partners, if she thought "Charles would mind" and, moreover, being thrust, by Charles' negligence, into the category of uncourted woman, she had to forego many an invitation because her acceptance would leave another girl marooned, partnerless, in a corner. But to remain at home with Charles when there were no guests seemed to her almost unbearably stupid.

This particular evening didn't vary from the usual schedule. Charles arrived late from the golf club, and dashed into his dinner clothes, while Mariana wandered impatiently around the drawing room, knowing the new chef was fuming in the kitchen below.

Then Charles insisted on cocktails and fussed about interminably with ice and glasses. Mariana merely touched hers to her lips and motioned the butler to announce dinner. But Charles refused to go in until he'd drained the last drop from the shaker.

Charles, in fine spirits after his exercise, settled himself to enjoy an excellently prepared dinner. They dined practically in silence.

Mariana, who was still ridden by her mood of restless discontent, was recalling certain thrilling little tete-a-tete dinners with Charles before their marriage—even later, after the honeymoon had set. She remembered the particular table that was always reserved for them at a smart, gay hotel restaurant, a cosily small table in a secluded corner with a centerpiece of roses and mimosaes, and lit by a little silk-shaded lamp.

The orchestra was entrancing, and the people at the surrounding tables gay, and carefree, and smartly dressed. Not that they mattered, for she and Charles were in a world of their own. The waiter, with a proud flourish, could scarcely get their attention to exhibit the plank of steamed, before serving it. Often, after course was removed untouched, while they talked and talked, eagerly, absorbedly, leaning to each other across the little table.

She wondered what they could possibly say to each other now, she and Charles, if they went back to that little table in that same restaurant. She wondered if she would remember that to say to any man if she should dine with him alone as just a beautiful girl, not Mrs. Charles Page, wife of a wealthy and prominent citizen.

Youth and romance seemed very far away, thought Mariana bitterly. Then the vision of Craig Cullam, as she had seen him in the play, flashed across her memory.

"That new chef's pretty good at puddings," Charles commented at that moment, "but, oh Lord, what success! You'd better get Thomas to see to them—didn't he do it when the last cook left? He's mighty good at it."

Mariana assented languidly. "Don't believe I'll take coffee tonight," remarked Charles when they had adjourned to the library and Mariana seated herself behind the coffee service, "Feeling sleepy—ho-hum—and want to turn in early."

He flung himself into a chair and seized a book at random.

Mariana busied herself with the coffee things, her slim fingers with their beautiful jewels, moving gracefully.

"You wouldn't care to go over to the Harringtons for a game, would you?" she suggested. "Linda spoke of it yesterday. It's quite informal."

"Uh uh," Charles made an ineffectual effort to suppress a yawn. "First days of golf always made me so confoundedly sleepy, or maybe it's spring fever. You go, if you want to."

"Certainly not," she declined coldly. "I'd make an uneven table."

She wandered into the music room and seating herself at the piano, swept her hands across the keys. Playing at random her fingers fitted themselves to a familiar air, something haunting and dreamy and strangely disquieting.

What was it, she thought? Where had she heard it? She had heard it recently. It was an air from some play.

With a sudden grimace, she broke off. She remembered now. It was the love song Craig Cullam sang two nights before in his marvelous play. She had heard him but once, yet it lingered in her subconscious mind.

A loud yawn from the library caused her to frown.

"Well, honey, think I'll turn in," Charles announced, cheerfully.

"Night!"

Mariana sat alone in the darkened music room before the great shining grand piano, her hands lying listlessly in her lap. Some where in the house a clock chimed nine times.

The evening stretched long and dreary and lonely before her. Was it a symbol of her life?

Expert Warns All Women Against Use of Cosmetics

(United Press)
CHICAGO, June 5.—Cosmetics were described as instruments toward skin ills and homeliness, rather than auxiliaries of beauty when Prof. H. N. Cole, associate professor of dermatology at Western Reserve University, spoke today before the convention of the American Medical Association.

Prof. Cole deplored the increasing use of cosmetics, which he said were always harmful to the complexion, and revealed statistics showing their consumption and data on the prevalence of poison-

Sage Tea Turns Gray Hair Dark

It's Grandmother's Recipe to Bring Back Color and Luster to Hair

That beautiful, even shade of dark, glossy hair can only be had by brewing a mixture of Sage Tea and Sulphur. Your hair is your charm. It makes or mars the face. When it fades, turns gray or streaked, just an application or two of Sage and Sulphur enhances its appearance a hundredfold.

Don't bother to prepare the mixture; you can get this famous old recipe improved by the addition of other ingredients at a small cost, all ready of use. It is called Wyeth's Sage and Sulphur Compound. This can always be depended upon to bring back the natural color and lustre of your hair.

Everybody uses "Wyeth's" Sage and Sulphur Compound now because it darkens so naturally and evenly that nobody can tell it has been applied. You simply dampen a sponge or soft brush with it and draw this through the hair, taking one small strand at a time; by morning the gray hair has disappeared, and after another application it becomes beautifully darkened in a State College, Professor and appears glossy and lustrous.
