Wide Range of Selections Offered

To those who have not examined the Syllabus for the coming Musical Festival, it will be interesting to learn that it includes a wide variety of selections.

The Executive of the Association reminds the public that this is their Festival, and they are anxious that all persons of musical ability participate.

The closing date for receiving entries is March 15th. The Officers of the Association point out that there may be many who are undecided about competing, and they suggest that in such cases, it would be wise to place an entry, as the cost of entering is negligible.

Longevity Candidates

By Uncle Joe

MRS. CATHERINE MORESIDE

The latest name to be added to the longevity list is that of Mrs. Catherine Moreside of Milton, who observed her 90th birthday on January last.

As this article will bring to a close this column, the writer would like to make a few comments on the 89 candidates whose names have appeared under the above caption. 64 of the candidates listed are over 90 years old; 5 have passed the century mark, and only four deaths have occurred among this remarkable group of old timers. Among the group are ten French Acadians. No Indian names were submitted for inclusion in this column, although the writer contacted their chief at Lennox Island.

Of the 89 names submitted sketches have appeared in all but seventeen which would seem to be quite remarkable in view of the fact that only ten personal interviews took place. Much information has been supplied by the different relatives of the candidates, and the writer is indebted to clergymen, doctors and college professors for their kind cooperation.

I have sought not so much to write the histories of these aged residents, as to record the places where they were born, the number of their children, and have purposely been very brief in regard to their personal achievements over the years. I only wish that this work had fallen into abler hands, so that their life stories might have been brought out with greater force and clearness.

In closing this article, I should like to quote a really fine poem from the pen of Isabella Crawford, who was one of Canada's first women poets, a woman who had experienced all the hardships of the pioneer.

The Pioneer The mighty storm strode laughing up the land And Max, the lab'r and the lover stood Within the forest's edge beside a tree— The massy king of all the woody tribes— Whose chattering branches rattled, As the bright axe moon-like through the air, Waking strange thunders, rousing echoes linked, From the full lion-throated roar to sighs Stealing on dove-voices through the distant aisles, Swift fell the axe, swift followed roar on roar, Till the bare woodland bellowed in its rage As the first-slain slow toppled to his face. "O King of Desolation, art thou dead?" Cried Max, and laughing heart and lips, leaped on The vast prone trunk, "And have I slain a king? Above his ashes will I build my house; No stone beneath its pillars, but— Soon the great heaps of brush were builded high, And, like a victor, Max made pause to clear His battlefield high strewn with tangled dead. Then roared the crackling mountains, and their fires Met in high heavens, clashing flame with flame; The thin winds swept a cosmos of red sparks Across the black midnight sky; and the sun Walked pale behind the resinous black-smoke.

PILLEY-MACNEILL WEDDING

The bride looked very charming in a street length dress of navy blue silk crepe with grey accessories. She carried a bouquet of American Beauty roses. She was attended by Miss Margaret Lowry, Charlottetown, who wore a street length dress of flowered jersey with brown accessories. Her bouquet consisted of carnations and snapdragon. The groom was ably supported
