Chateau Sinister

By Leslie Beresford

"Anyhow, what you certainly will have to tell now is the fact that you're alive," O'Hara snapped. "You're not hiding away here any longer, letting Caryl Fayne suffer for your misdeeds, whatever they were. You're straightening this business out right away."

The other flung out a gesture of abhorrence and determination. "I'm doing nothing of the sort, I'm officially dead and I'm staying dead," he declared emphatically. "Not after Rittenberg and I have been to the police here and told all we know," said O'Hara just as emphatically, and added: "You've asked for it, anyhow, sending that letter to Caryl Fayne. She doesn't want your money now, there's been so much trouble attached to it. If she knew you were alive—"

"That's what I didn't want her to know," the other urged. When I wrote I didn't think anyone would come over from there, prying around—"

"It doesn't matter what you thought," Rittenberg interrupted him. "You put up a bluff that's fallen down. You've got to come out into broad daylight, not only because of Miss Fayne, but you've got to come out most of all because on your own words—you're the one person who can put Yusuf Hussein where apparently he belongs. Among other things, let me remind you, because you say he was responsible for the murder of Peter Burnaby."

Again the other hid his face behind his hands as he crouched on the table. His attitude and expression as Rittenberg had been speaking was that of a man gradually but quite definitely admitting defeat. He was silent for some time, then looked up suddenly. And now it did seem that he was facing the situation more hopefully.

"You're right," he admitted. "And I suppose I'll have to do it. I ought to have done it long ago when Hussein began to come after me. But—I fumbled it. I didn't want to be mixed up in the business, I don't now. I wanted to be allowed to slip away quietly and live my own life—"

"If so, why did you trouble to write that letter to Miss Fayne?" O'Hara asked, puzzled. "What was this information you were so anxious she should have?"

"It would have been wiser to leave well alone," the other sighed wearily. "But there was some valuable property hidden in the Chateau I thought she ought to have. And also, just in case she did have any trouble with Hussein, I wanted to warn her against him. There were documents about him, hidden in the same place—"

NAME OF HUSSEIN

"That's torn it!" ejaculated Rittenberg, and looked across at O'Hara, before he went on: "I'm afraid Hussein's made a clean sweep of that lot, Mr. Fayne."

"Hussein?"

The other listened while Rittenberg explained, and then gestured despairingly.

"Then Hussein's got possession of the only real proof against him!" he said. "The only material evidence of the story I could tell."

"We can't help that," O'Hara insisted. "What you can tell the police, anyhow, will be enough to get the Yard to deal with Hussein here in London—"

"In London?" The other stared again, started this time. "You mean that Hussein's actually here—in London?"

At O'Hara's nod, his hands beat the air in agitation.

"What's brought him here?" he questioned in a panic again. "Surely that girl hasn't been silly enough to let him know anything—about that letter?"

"Don't be silly!" O'Hara stopped his clamour with a certain contempt. "How could Hussein know you were living in London, anyhow? Even Miss Fayne doesn't know that. She thinks that letter came from Burnaby. I haven't as yet let her have even a hint that Andrew Fayne is not dead. As for Hussein knowing it—why be afraid of the impossible?"

"Possibly. But, I can't risk the chance of him finding out. Supposing he chanced to catch sight of me in the street? I'm not leaving this flat. The police will have to come to me, and give me protection as well."

It was arranged in the end that O'Hara would get in touch with the Yard that evening, fixing an appointment to come to the flat in the news next day just before noon bringing Inspector Welcome with him.

He was a little doubtful in mind, however, when he returned to the West-end with Rittenberg in taxi. "I suppose it's safe enough, leav-
