Bardelys The Magnificent

(Continued) I did his bidding, and from the breast of his doublet I drew some loose letters and a locket which held the miniature of a woman's face. "I want you to deliver all to her, monsieur." "It shall be done," I answered, deeply moved. "Hold it—hold it up," he begged, his voice weakening. "Let me behold the face."

Long his eyes rested on the likeness I held before him. At last, as one in a dream— "Well-beloved," he sighed, "Bien aimee!" Add down his grey, haggard cheeks the tears came slowly. "Forgive this weakness, monsieur," he whispered brokenly. "We were to have been wed in a month had you not been wed to the daughter of the noble lord, as though that noble lord had robbed him of the half of that vitality remained. Tell her, monsieur, that my—dying thoughts—were of her. Tell—tell her—"

"Her name?" I cried, fearing he would sink before I learned it. "Tell me her name." He looked at me with eyes that were growing dim and vacant. Then he seemed to brace himself and to rally for a second. "Her name?" he mused, in a far-off manner. "She is—Mademoiselle de—"

CHAPTER IV. A Maid in the Moonlight. I do not know whether it was the influence of that thing lying in a corner of the barn under the eaves that Rodenard had flung over it, or whether other influences of destiny were at work to impel me to rise at the end of a half-hour and announce my detestation and my quarters more congenial.

"Tomorrow," I instructed Gany-nede, as I stood ready to mount, you will retrace your steps with the others, and, finding the road to Lavedan, you will follow me to the chateau."

"But you cannot hope to reach it tonight, monsieur, through a country that is unknown to you," he protested. "I do not hope to reach it tonight, will ride south until I come upon some hamlet that will afford me shelter and, in the morning, direction."

I left him with that, and set out at a brisk trot. Night had fallen and the sky was clear, and a crescent moon came opportunely if feebly to dispel the gloom. I quitted the field, and went back until I gained a crossroad, where, turning to the right, I set my face to the Pyrenees, and rode briskly again. That I had chosen wisely was proved when some twenty minutes later I clattered into the hamlet of Mirepoix, and drew up before an inn flaunting the sign of a peacock—

As I was entering the hostelry there was a clatter of hoofs in the street, and four dragoons headed by a sergeant, rode up and halted at the door of the Paon. They seemed to have ridden hard and some distance, for their horses were foamed almost to the last point of endurance.

Within, I called the host, and having obtained a flagon of the best vintage—Heaven fortify those that must be content with the worst!—I passed on to make inquiries touching my whereabouts.

I gained my horse, and vaulted into the saddle. Tearing the reins from the urchin that held them, and driving my spurs into the beast's flanks, I went careering down the street at a gallop, gripping tightly with my knees, whilst the stirrups, which I had had no time to step into, flew wildly about my legs.

A pistol cracked behind me; then another, and a sharp, stinging pain in the shoulder warned me that I was hit. But I took no heed of it then. The wound could not be serious, else I had already been out of the saddle, and it would be time enough to look to it when I had outdistanced my pursuers. For nigh upon a half-hour I rode, before I could be said to have got clear of them, and then for aught I knew they were still following, resolved to bound me down by the aid of such information as they might cull upon their way.

I was come by then to the Garonne. I drew rein beside the swiftly flowing stream, wading itself like a flood of glittering silver between the black shadows of its banks. A little while I sat there listening, and surveying the stately, turreted chateau that loomed, grey, noble pile, beyond the water. I speculated what demesne his might be, and I realized that it was probably Lavedan.

I pondered what I had best do, and in the end I took the resolve to swim the river and knock at the gates. If it were indeed Lavedan, I had but to announce myself, and to one of my name surely its hostilities would be spread. If it were some other household, even then the name of Marcel de Bardelys should suffice to ensure me a welcome.

By spurring and coaxing, I lured my steed into the river. There is a proverb having it that though you may lead a horse to the water you cannot make him drink. It would have been applied to my case, for although I had brought mine to the water, I could not make him swim; his back, and set myself to swim beside him, leading him by the stand under the shadow of the chateau mansion now before me.

hold him; he plunged frantically unequal to the task of resisting the current, so that in the end I let beast had turned back, and, having snorted, coughed, and struggled gamely, but the current was bearing him away, and his efforts hoping that he would land further away along the path by which we brought us no nearer to the opposite shore. At last I slipped from his back, and set myself to swim, at least, I could not make him beside him, leading him by the stand under the shadow of the chateau mansion now before me.

Too late I saw the mistake that I had made. I own it was a blunder that no man of ordinary intelligence should have permitted himself to have committed. Remembering the unrest of the province, I should rather have concluded that their business was more like to be in that connection.

"It is held, at least," cried one of the troopers, with a burst of laughter. Then came the sergeant's voice, cold and formal— "In the King's name, Monsieur de Lesperon, I arrest you."

So, my mind worked quickly in this desperate situation, and realizing how dire and urgent the need to attempt an escape, I leapt suddenly back to find myself in the arms of his followers. But in moving I had caught up by one of its legs the stool upon which I had been sitting. As I raised it, I eluded the pinioning grip of the troopers. I twisted in their grasp and brought the stool down upon the head of one of them with a force that drove him, to his knees. Up went that three-legged stool again, to descend like a thunderbolt upon the head of another. That freed me, the sergeant was coming up behind, but the point was gained. My improvised battle-axe sent the two remaining soldiers apart to look to their swords. Ere they could draw, I had darted like a hare between them and out into the street. The sergeant, cursing them with horrible volubility, followed closely upon my heels.

Leaping as far into the roadway as I could, I turned to meet the fellow's onslaught. Using the stool as a battering ram, I caught his thrust upon it. So violently was it delivered that the point buried itself in the wood and the blade snapped, leaving him with a hit and a stamp of steel. I wasted no time in hesitating. I leapt over just as the two unhurt dragoons came stumbling out of the tavern.
