THE OUTLAW

The Story of a Girl Who Didn't Want to Marry

By ETHEL LLOYD PATT.

Chapter XXII

Mother refused to listen to my protests about her wedding dress. Once she had determined to give it to me, she made the sacrifice whole heartedly. She went at once to her trunk and unfolded it from the old towels and tissue paper in which it had lain for years. What it meant to mother now to cut it up and make it into an evening dress for me, perhaps I only guessed. All these years she had kept it carefully put away. She had been too poor to be asked to dine or parties. So in a few years, when the gown had drifted out of style and life had become even more pitiful for mother, her one thought had been to keep it to wear in her casket. Poor mother! I suppose she realized she had not the strength for the struggle, that soon she must go.

Childlike, though, now after the first awe of her sacrifice was over I was lost in the interest of acquiring the sort of costume I never before had owned. And mother entered into my plans with enthusiasm.

It had been a plain white satin gown with a train. The sleeves were long and it had a high neck of the modest time of mother's marriage. It shocked her a little, I think to realize, that an evening gown for me in this day and age, would have to be cut well away from the throat and leave bare my arms. But I was surprised at mother's taste and skill. Once we had decided upon the pattern, cut from an evening newspaper, mother tipped and bustled until before the day was done, the gown was more than a promise of what it was to be.

Once, I remember, as mother knelt beside me turning up the hem of the skirt, she paused and glanced up into my face. "Just think Nellie," she said "my wedding dress! I never thought then I'd be fixing it over for you, dear. Oh, I hope it will bring you luck!" "It's got to mother," I told her. "I've just got to get that position with the Champion Film Company. Mother, dear, you're making the dress so pretty, they'll have to take me. Just think. Three dollars a day. If only they keep me busy six days a week!" "I didn't mean that kind of luck dear," mother said, as she patted my hand. "I meant the kind of luck I had when I married the man I loved." "What could I say? I didn't want to hurt her. How could I tell her that my hard young heart told me her luck wasn't luck at all? How could I tell her that as it seemed to me then, I would rather have died than to have married such a man as my father, to give my seven and my courage in work and in bringing his children into the world?" "Mother I had two full days in which to finish the dress before I would wear it for my trial before the moving picture camera. We slaved on it until late the night before I was to go into the city with it. When it was finished, I remember we thought it as handsome and smart a costume as any girl could desire. I dare say, as a matter of fact, it was a rather pitiful effort. The neck was cut sufficient high to be amusing, probably, to any one accustomed to the darling toilettes of that time. Mother had tried to bring herself to do away with the sleeves entirely. But we had compromised. It had ended in our draping some soft material nearly down to my elbows. But at least the gown was simple and pretty in line. For my part I had no misgivings about it. At seven o'clock in the morning I was to be on time at the Champion Film offices—I let my home, with the wonderful dress wrapped carefully in a large paper box.

Even mother's white silk stockings and satin slippers were there to make the costume complete. Fortunately for me, mother was a little larger than I was. Her slippers were, if anything, too large for me. Also, they were yellowed by age. But we had both decided that, since I was by no means a star but only one of the crowd, the size of my feet or the color of the slippers would pass unnoticed.

This time I went up in the elevator to the Champion Film offices with considerable more assurance. I spoke firmly to the boy behind the big desk when I gave him my name and asked for Mr. Seely. I followed him down the long hall and into that gentleman's office with my heart pounding loudly in my breast; but with no forebodings. Mr. Seely looked up as I entered. "Hello," he said. "What can I do for you this morning?" "For a moment I didn't quite understand. "I've come," I told him breathlessly. "I've come with the dress. I'm ready to go to work."

The man looked at me amazedly for a moment. "Oh, yes," he said, "I remember. I told you that you could go in that coronation scene. But I thought you said you didn't have a dress. Then we didn't hear from you, so I filled you in. We've all the girls we need now."

For a moment there was absolute silence in the horrid, ill-smelling office. Then I clasped my hands—my voice quivered. "Oh! I cried. "Don't—don't! You've got to take me! It's my mother's wedding dress I've brought. She gave it to me to give me my chance. She's cut it up, she's made it over for me now. You've got to take me!" Suddenly the tears welled in my eyes and rolled down my cheeks. The man behind the desk had leaned forward and was staring at me. "By jove!" he said, "Ripping!" and pounded his fist on the arm of his chair. "Ripping good stuff. Mother's wedding dress cut up to give daughter start in life! Gee! I told you you had movie eyes."

He jumped to his feet, came around the desk and took my arm. "Come on, kid," he said, "we'll give you your chance. Come on."
