W. C. T. U. NOTES

NO POPPIES GROW

Each day more crosses grow on row but most are where no poppies grow. Some bleach beneath the desert sun; some rot and mold in jungle rank. Mild snow and ice there's more than one. But none at all where vessel sank. No poppies grow the whole world round. Though that is where our dead are found. Their spirits rise, again they plead To you who live, that you give heed. And not forget the torch they caught When flung to them from Flanders Field. By fathers who gave life for naught Their sons now plead, their torch you shield. Their fathers join them in this plea. The choice is yours, what shall it be? —Dr. J. Francis Smith.

FRANCES WILLARD

We know that in the history of human thought, discovery or invention, any new idea first takes shape within some individual mind before it can be of universal value. Willard, the only woman to be so honored in exquisite white Carver's marble in the Statuary Hall in the Capital at Washington, D. C., she was declared to be "the foremost woman of the nineteenth century, the most beloved character of her time and, under God, a benefactress of our human race."

CONVENTION ADDRESS

Since the days of our revered Frances Willard, prohibition has ever been our watchword, but the presence and liquor men are forever pointing out the evils that existed during the last prohibition period. They talk of the murder, the robbery, the racket, the bootlegging that was rampant but fail to show that statistics prove otherwise. Government Control these things continue to flourish with the flow of liquor.

Can anyone who knows all the far-reaching and evil effects of beverage alcohol be content to let our country spend, as it is doing, over $30 million dollars this year on the traffic? 76% above the pre-war days year. Congressional Record of last December, C. S. Longwell tells of the main benefits derived under National Prohibition in the U.S.A. for the ten-year period from 1921-1931 as gathered from official figures and records. Death rates from alcoholism decreased 42%. Insanity from the same cause 66%. Drunkenness 70% and a general crime 54%. Surely the experiment has been a trying one for no other benefit than the saving of 108,000 people from alcoholic deaths. Before prohibition these institutes had as many as 20,000 patients and, at the end of the first year, the only one left operating had merely 180 patients. What better proof could one have of the benefits of prohibition? We know the fine record held by our only dry province, Prince Edward Island, and how increasingly difficult it is for them to maintain their position.

ALSO THE HILL

by Frances Parkinson Keys

Kelita Bryant, the prosecuting attorney rose and began to address the court.

"The facts very briefly are these: My client, who is employed in the House Office Building, on November 22nd of last year, gave instructions to the House mail truck to go to the residence of Chester Slade and pick up certain material there. Shortly after the truck returned, certain mail sacks were brought to the office which she is employed. She says she made no attempt to determine whether they were addressed to her or what they contained, and she said she ordered the messenger to take them away.

She says that since being served with this subpoena she has made no effort to obey. With the court's permission I should like to ask the monographer to read the record of what has transpired up to now in the grand jury room.

The elderly little justice turned to Justice Jennings and said, "I have some questions, Miss Farman, he said in a gentle voice, "that the prosecuting attorney has correctly stated what took place? There is no necessity of reading the record if his statement is correct."

Daniel waited breathless for Justice to answer. But he waited only a minute. Her reply came unhesitatingly and clearly, almost insolently.

"Well, Your Honor, I suppose I should have gone and seen the driver, or what Mr. Vaughn had already called up the postmaster."

Justice Jennings interrupted Justice. "That is not what I am asking you," he said, "I am asking you whether there is any dispute as to whether or not the prosecuting attorney has correctly stated what took place."

"I haven't got the mail sacks, so I couldn't produce them," Justice said, still more insolently.

"Apparently you do not understand me," Justice said, "I want to know whether his statement is a true statement."

"The time there was an instant's hesitation before Justice replied. But when she did so, she gave the effect of defiance, almost as if she had tossed back her head, though this was not actually so. "Yes, it is correct, Sir," she said, "very well, that is all I want to know for the present. Now I want you to tell me next why it was that when the mail sacks came to you, you did not preserve them."

Justice Jennings explained. "The justice had sounded relieved when he began, as if he hoped her acknowledgment that the prosecuting attorney had made a true statement marked a turning point in his interrogation of his bold, troublesome girl. But his relief, if it existed was short-lived. Justice went on with increasing assurance.

"I didn't see any reason why I should try to preserve them. I went for one sack and there was a whole truckload of them; it was almost impossible to source that many through the door. Some important constituents of mine and I was talking with them. I was very busy. I didn't have time to look through a great mound of mail sacks. Besides I was told they weren't all for Mr. Vaughn. So I said to the driver that I just wanted him to leave the sack that had Mr. Vaughn's speeches in it. After all, that was the only one I had ordered the truck to go for."

"Your statement is what now, Counselor?"

"The justice had turned back to Bryant, asking a question with the air of suppressing a sigh. The prosecuting attorney answered with some hesitance.

"My statement, Sir, is that although these sacks were brought to the office where this girl is employed, on December 19 and were thereafter taken away at her direction and although she admits that she subsequently went to Congressman Vaughn's storeroom and saw there a number of mail sacks lying on the floor she made no effort to obey the mandate of the grand jury."

Appalled

What have you to say about that? Justice Jennings inquired of Jennings, thought if the grand jury wanted evidence they would send for it.

Jennings was appalled at the insouciance with which she was speaking. She did not see how it would fail to bring forth a rebuttal, and the justice proceeded in the same gentle way as before.

"Now as a matter of fact, the girl of the situation at present is in my store, and she is certain that in Mr. Vaughn's storeroom—"

"May I explain to the Court?" Kelita Bryant asked interrupting Justice quickly. "When Miss Farman says they are not in Mr. Vaughn's storeroom, she means they are not in the vault in this large storeroom to which I believe some eight or ten Congressmen have access, and they are there in the same gentle way as before."

"Let me ask you this, Mr. prosecuting attorney, Miss Farman is in a tremendously embarrassing position. Supposing Congressman Vaughn told her not to trouble with that stuff?"

"Now you're hitting the nail on the head, Mr. Justice, I know she was abetting Vaughn. I know those were my orders," Jennings was saying proudly rather than defiantly this time.

"She says that now, but she has not made any statement to the grand jury to that effect."

"Well, look at this, the girl placed in a pretty bad spot if her superior has told her not to trouble with that stuff. In fact, the fact is that she has authority to move it without Congressman Vaughn's authorization."

"She has the authorization of the grand jury subpoena which calls upon her to produce the mail sacks?"

"Bryant delivered to her of her question to her. "If you are permitted to see here now, will you get those eight sacks?"

"I can't guarantee what I can do, I don't know. But I am sure Mr. Vaughn wants to be as helpful as he can. He has already told Mr. Loper that he did."

"Then if you were allowed to do it, you would get those sacks and bring them down to the grand jury?"

"I inquired the justice, his quavering voice suddenly persuasive as he refrained the prosecuting attorney's question.

"Yes, I would. I will at least. That is all I am asking," Bryant said curtly.

"When do you want them delivered, Mr. Bryant?" the justice inquired mildly.

"We would like to have them as soon as possible. I suppose it is rather late in the afternoon to get them today."

"Yes, my suggestion is that as Miss Farman now says she will do everything in her power to comply, she shall be permitted to appear in the court and state her version."

"That is all we want; either the sacks or a reasonable explanation of why they have not been produced."

"Now if everything is satisfactorily adjusted, that will end it as far as the court is concerned. Otherwise, Miss Farman, you will appear here at 2 o'clock tomorrow."

"Very well, Sir."
