In martial array and to stirrin music suggestive of marching order and played on cornet and trombon the Musical Macs made their firs appearance at Wonderland last night The Wonderful Musical Macs woul seem a more fitting title, for the are the cleverest musicians com Islandwards for many moons. Thei first performance was on a steel instrument entirely new to audience here, the Bowina. Sweetly clear the notes fell, a familiar strain gaining additional harmony on this novel instrument. Then followed trick violin playing, Mr. Mack manipulating the violin on top of his head, on one foot, behind his back, etc., a banjo accompaniment by Mrs. Mack keeping merry time and tune all the while. Their banjo playing was along similar lines and fully as effective. A baritone and cornet duet by the two Macks was grand, superb in tone and full rich melody; a duo on the Marimbaphone, another new instrument being sweet, telling and rich in harmony. The last act was on the Chimes, a most expensive aluminum instrument, nicke-plated and the very soul of music. Mrs. Mack rendered "Sweet Adeline" in a gloriously magnificent voice as a touch of completeness to a musical entertainment grand beyond expectation, rare in quality and full of he essence and grandeur of music—the art beyond compare.

The following little extract, from the forthcoming book by Miss Lucy Maud Montgomery of Park Corner, in this Province may be of interest to Guardian readers: "Yes, it's red," said Anne resignedly. "Now you see why I can't be perfectly happy. Nobody could who had red hair. I don't mind the other things so much—the freckles and the green eyes and my skininess. I can imagine them away. I can imagine that I have a beautiful rose-leaf complexion and lovely starry violet eyes. But I cannot imagine that red hair away. It will be my lifelong sorrow. I read of a girl once in a novel who had a lifelong sorrow but it wasn't red hair. Her hair was pure gold rippling back from an alabaster brow. What is a alabaster brow? I never could find out. Can you tell me?" In this book, Anne Of Green Gables, which L. C. Page & Company of Boston will publish in April is promised one of the most delightful and original girl characters in recent fiction. In the imaginative little orphan who finds a home with th old farmer and his spinster sister. Miss Montgomery has created a character woich will take its plase alongside of Mrs. Wiggin's charming Rebecca.
