Lonely Parade

By Fannie Hurst

"I believe you're proposing marriage to me, Kitty—at my age!"
"I am, John—at our age!"
"Why in heaven's name didn't I think of it first? Come here! Take off those purple mitts and pat your hand back on mine. That must have been a thrill I felt a moment ago, right through those mitts. Didn't have the sense to know it or didn't dare to know it. Come here!"

The Charlottenburg's production of "The Boys and Girls Shoestring Review," presented in conjunction with a brand new film of producers, Milton and Shuster, two young men with more backbone than backing, derived its name from the fact that it had figuratively been produced on a shoestring. New faces fresh young voices, unknown names scenery designed and executed by students in a school of theatrical design, had accomplished a new low in Broadway production costs.

"The Boys and Girls Shoestring Review" raised a first night curtain with the Charlottenburg stage—an "I would rather provide your entertainment than your civic virtues" written across it in rhinestones. Chatty and accl as a gossip sheet, current as an editorial, Shoestring Review, by way of three sheets and paid newspaper space, proclaimed itself as "Beautiful but not Dumb."

In the centre of twenty inches of exorbitant white newspaper space the Charlottenburg announced in five metropolitan newspapers, the Sunday preceding the opening, that she had the honor to present "A review so stunningly conceived that even its failure would be flawless."

An urban and urbane audience, as carefully and purposefully untypical of Broadway first nights as the new faces on the stage were untypical of old favorites, crowded into the pit-sized theater.

Intimate as two in a hansom cab, "The Boys and Girls Shoestring Review," recruited chiefly from summer stock companies, little theater groups, dramatic schools, mingled with the audience, danced through it and even with it, rushing down from the footlights to pick their partners from the orchestra seats for a scholastic in the aisles, dragged miniature planes with them, coaxed spectators from their seats up to the stage for tea and stronger; crashed down with lively insouciance the classic barriers of curtain and footlights and resolved the evening into an intimate novelty that ended in a free-for-all audience and cast quiz. "How Well Informed Are You?" (patent pending), which was played with such riotous effect in the town's new hit, "The Boys and Girls Shoestring Review." Another Kitty Mullane novelty, sure to set the town agog.

From the first moment of the entrance of the fifty new faces on to a stage set divided into two dressing rooms, where twenty-five girls and twenty-five boys changed from their street clothes into rehearsal rompers, the casual trifle of an evening began to spell success. From every carefully rehearsed ad lib to every impeccably planned bit of spontaneous familiarity with the audience to every well thought out bit of extemporaneous stage business, the Charlottenburg's hand picked boys and girls moved to the mysterious and intangible rhythm of audience approval.
Without a break in the hilarious stride of the evening, "The Boys and Girls Shoestring Review," marched to what have been its final curtain, had it boasted one, but which consisted instead of the fifty boys and girls rushing from the stage out into the auditorium to assist the audience into its wraps, singing their theme hit, "That's All There Isn't Any More." Something almost troglodytic about her, the Charlottenburg, up there in the cave of her draped loge, struck her cane on the floor against audience exodus and without rising cast her pale amused eyes over the standing and applauding mass of audience which by now had learned to expect, in fact demand, a first night curtain speech.

"Well! Customers," she said, lackadaisically raising her pudge of a hand for silence, "you like my brats, don't you? (Applaud.) You like them because through your venerated outer shells you sense what is adventurous and young. (Laughter.) If you would let Charlottenburg run your entertainment lives for you, you wouldn't have white corporals from enemies of the aesthetic. (Laughter.) You like these kids for the same reason that you like springtime and the smell of coffee and young Olympian runners with torches. This show doesn't deal in white meat or smut. It's quick and clean, like the young Olympic runner with the torch. My associates and I are proud to have given you this show. These kids you saw tonight are as American as ham and eggs. I'm proud of them. Spread the news around town that my nice clean American brats are something to see! If the critics don't agree, I'll meet those who are still here in the back lot later."
A wag in the gallery called down, "Charlottenburg for mayor!"
"Not on your life. I'd rather provide your laughter than your civic virtues."
"By both."
"Good night, everybody. Turn up your collars, it's snowing. Good night. I love you all. If the critics don't rave tomorrow, it's because they have hardening of the heart arteries. Run along, everybody. Run along."
The exodus was slow, reluctant, good-humored. The Charlottenburg turned back to the occupants of her box—Kitty, John, Sierra and Erna.

Ellen's Diary

has known from birth. And it was from a sight of these two, that granddaughters turned wistfully away. "When I grow to be a big girl," she remarked "I'll be able to go too—I'll ride with granddaddy!" "But what about school?" she queried. She smiled in rows of white teeth, and well acquainted with the workings of cousin Jamie's days "But there'll be the Saturdays!" she said "there's always the Saturdays!" A sturdy, healthy little lady, this only granddaughter of ours is, fair skinned, blue eyed, and with golden hair that creeps out beneath her bonnet in curls, reaching now to her shoulders. Good and wilful by turns, sunny and tearful as well, busy the day through, Jamie finds her "most angelic of all in the Children's hour", that magical time, when their day is nearing an end "between the dark and the daylight" and a period of quiet play or story-telling leads up calmly to such small ones' retiring.
The arrival of snow and frost would not dismay Jamie this morning. He would be pleased that he had accomplished a chore after yesterday's school hours. Carolyn said it had been "on his mind" for some time, and missing him from the yards then, she saw him return after an absence, his wagon laden with evergreen branches to cover some precious lawn-plantings. While James is of the opinion it would help more with the farming if he would undertake to put down hay and straw for the stock, instead of worrying over the plants on the lawn" we have an idea that the former will in
