Tomorrow is Forever
by Gwen Bristow

the purpose of two required a thousand adjustments. But it meant that he was back in the sphere of active men, doing something that needed to be done, and occupation relieved him of leisure for brooding.

Much of Jacoby's practice at this time dealt with reconstruction of wounded soldiers, and he got into the habit of coming to the laboratory for advice, at first to bolster his analyst's returning assurance and later because he needed his counsel. For at the embittered wreck Arthur Kittredge gradually turned into the confident scientist, Erich Kessler, the youthful violence of the first changed to the gentle wisdom of a man who had sunk into the ultimate hopelessness and had come back. Arthur Kittredge had wanted to die; Erich Kessler, after a long hard battle, wanted to live. Kessler wanted to live because at last he found other people more important than himself, and this came about because he found, at first to his own amazement, that he had something valuable to give them. While he still had to be carried to his wheelchair and lifted out of it, his efforts to be of some use to Jacoby widened into his being of use to a great many others.

As he progressed from elementary routines into tasks of more complexity, Kessler began to act as amanuensis for Jacoby as well as technician. He sat in a corner during Jacoby's interviews with his patients, taking notes of their symptoms. As he never said anything, his presence came to be accepted like that of the furniture in the consulting-room. Then, gradually, he fell into the habit of letting the patients talk to him if they called when Jacoby was otherwise occupied. He began to learn how many others there were besides himself who had to recover from the impact that physical disability had made on their lives. Jacoby had profound wisdom for these people, but sometimes, looking at Jacoby's healthy body, they did not believe it. When they looked at Kessler, still limp in his wheelchair, they knew he knew what they were talking about.

Almost automatically, Jacoby was massaging the muscles of his patient's right arm. "These are fabby," he observed. "While you are lying in bed for a few minutes at a time, clench your fist slowly and relax it slowly. Slowly, remember! That won't tax your strength, but you must take care of this arm. You will need it."

"For a crutch?" said the new-made Erich Kessler, with a note of his old bitterness.

"I hope there will be a crutch," Jacoby answered quietly. "Remember, I've promised nothing about your legs except to do the best I can with them."

"All right, all right, I know. A man isn't hoping for too much in this world when he hopes for a crutch, is he?"

Jacoby addressed him sternly. "My friend, until you can face what you're up against now, you aren't fit to try to go further."

"There was a long silence. At last the patient said, "I get it, Jacoby. And—ah—thank you, Jacoby. Stand up. Thank you, you are not being angry with me, are you?"

"Oh, shut up, will you?" He felt like changing the subject. "By the way, Jacoby, this Erich Kessler—me—am I a Jew like you?"

"No, why? Were you a Jew at home?"

"No, that's why I asked. I thought if I was to me one here you'd better teach me something about the religion of it. But if I'm not, then it's not important."

Starting to remember now that there had been a time when one could say, "It's not important," carelessly, and then forget about it. There was nobody then to tell him that Erich Kessler was a Jew was going to be so important later on that it would enable him to save Jacoby's child.

When he was in a wheelchair, he went to live with Jacoby. It was almost like living in a hospital. Jacoby had his own kitchen and went all day and half the night. There was still lack of food, drugs, trained assistants. Jacoby worked like a demon. Watching him work threw Kessler into dark periods of dismay at his own uselessness. Once he spoke of this to Jacoby, he received one of the quiet, direct replies he had learned to expect from his friend.

"Kessler, no man who genuinely wants to be of use in the world is ever useless for long. But that's a question you must answer for yourself. If I tried to answer it for you, I should be doing you an injury greater than any you have suffered. I should be telling you that it is no longer necessary for you to be responsible for your own life, and that is a crime I won't commit against anybody."

Still trembling from the storm that had struck him, Kessler found this hard to take. Later on he blessed Jacoby for having made him take it, refusing to sink into the childish dependency which at first seemed so comfortable a cushion for his tortured spirit. But since Jacoby did refuse, and his own bodily lassitude made his mind eager for activity, he had to search for a place he was capable of occupying. His first suggestion was made timidly.

"Jacoby, I don't know a thing about medicine or surgery, but if there's one thing I do know it's chemistry. Do you think I could learn to do some of these routine analyses that take up so much of your time? Blood-counts, and things like that?"

"Why not?" Jacoby returned eagerly. "If you only knew how much I need a technician! I'll be back in a minute, and come back with an armful of books which he dumped by the table he had rigged up to match the wheel-chair.

AN OPEN LETTER RE C.C.M. Products

CANADA CYCLE AND MOTOR COMPANY LIMITED
WESLON, ONT. CANADA

Indications are, that there will be a gradual increase in some lines of goods for civilian use depending, of course, on the availability of material and production facilities. This should result in the accentuated production of C.C.M. products, and on this assumption we are planning as follows:

C.C.M. BICYCLES AND "SPARES"
Bicycles, being recognized as necessary for essential transportation, and as the materials for bicycle manufacturing will be made available much quicker than material for products not so essential for public use, we predict that the production of bicycles and "spares" will be increased rapidly from this time forward. We anticipate that by the spring of 1945 many more bicycles will be available.

C.C.M. JOYCICLES AND OTHER JUVENILE VEHICLES
Juvenile vehicles for "Young Canada", C.C.M. Joycycles, Bike-Wagons, Joyriders will be produced in quantities in the spring of next year, depending, of course, on the supply of manufacturing materials.

C.C.M. SKATES, SKIS AND HOCKEY STICKS
C.C.M. Skate and Shoe Matched Sets, C.C.M. Laminated Hockey Sticks and dealers' stocks on or about the first week of December of this year. One popular model of C.C.M. Figure Skates is also expected to be ready on or about the same period. We regret, however, that C.C.M. Figure Skating Shoes will not be available of course, on the supply of manufacturing materials.

C.C.M. SKATE AND SHOE MATCHED SETS, C.C.M. LAMINATED HOCKEY STICKS AND JOYRIDERS will be produced in limited quantities, and are expected to be in C.C.M. dealers' stocks on or about the first week of December of this year. One popular model of C.C.M. Figure Skates is also expected to be ready on or about the same period. We regret, however, that C.C.M. Figure Skating Shoes will not be available of course, on the supply of manufacturing materials.

We wish to thank our dealers for the way they have cooperated with us in serving the public under trying conditions which, unfortunately, may still persist for some time.

Yours very truly,
