Reviews Crop And Livestock Situation Here

Mr. L. Roper who has been travelling extensively over the island in his official capacity of Dominion cattle fieldman, states that potato growers are hard hit in many areas despite spraying precautions taken. Some of the farmers are considering digging a portion of the crop in order to save as many of the tubers as they can.

The strangest sight he had seen, Mr. Roper said, was fields of grain, ripened to the shelling state, being cut near fields of standing hay.

In many localities the grain is fast ripening although 70 percent of farmers are still haying.

Mangle and turnip crops look well but control of weeds is difficult due to continuous rains and the shortage of farm labor.

At present there is a high demand for high class Island dairy cattle, particularly Jersey points in the United States. Mr. Seely Roy Amby of the Walker Gordon Laboratories, Inc., Charles River, Mass., recently purchased a load of dairy cows of various breeds, which have been delivered to New Brunswick, and which he has proved so satisfactory that Mr. Amby will be returning for larger shipments; in fact he will require several cars per year.

At present this establishment in various units has on hand 3600 cattle of various breeds and is operating a Rotolac milker. The carries 12 cows and is in operation 21 hours daily although it requires only one minute per cow. This farm supplies certified milk to various parts of Massachusetts. It is pasteurized in 17 seconds and never comes in contact with air until it reaches the consumer. The cows are washed under high pressure water.

Mr. Roper states that prices paid for good cattle, 1200 lbs. and range from $170 to $225 (These are ordinary well bred cattle of the Holstein, Gurnsey, and Ayrshire breeds and not show cattle).

Mr. Roper commented on the increase in many Island districts to breed herds to beef steers. This is due chiefly to labour shortage and will, it is feared, lead to a better and cheese production. The demand for beef is such that it matters little in this regard. At present the number of beef owners is much greater than last year.

Mr. Roper also commented on the increase in the production, indicating that Island farmers are doing their best to assist in filling the quota for Britain. On many farms visited, where there used to be six or seven hogs there is now more than double that number. One farm alone there are 300 more hogs and are being cared for under the self-feeding system which requires refilling of feeders only three days and the only other attention being the supplying of water and dry bedding.

He released her hands and moved to the bed. "What's that?" He pointed to the dog.

"Oh, that's the Admiral, or so you all said last night. He was with you and your friends."

"That happened to my friends?"

"Yes, after a while and after a fashion."

They were at ease now, the homecoming was real, and there were many things that Emily wanted to talk about. What was Jeff going to do? Where were they going to move? But even before she could form these questions into words, she saw that he was not yet ready to think of their shock though, in one moment of seriousness, when he said "Look, Emily, you've been a peach about keeping your little job all about the full 'til I get myself organized in a week or so and you can quit."

Her little job! She wanted to tell him all about it. But she did not want to talk about herself, to boast, so instead she said "Everything will be fine with you as soon as they all realize you're home."

There was a ticklish elation in Emily those days. But there was something else as well, something, when she allowed herself to think of it, that was not so pleasant. She saw that she and Ellis had to adjust to each other once again.

Ellis did not go to work immediately. There were many friends to see, people who had not seen since the war, even if there was some one there were places called Blind Pigs, dark, hidden little places where, if you knew the man to look at you from behind a grilled opening in the door, you could enter and buy a light brown drink called "Blind Pig".

Just about the time that Emily began to worry that Ellis might become a chronic drunkard, he gave up going to the Blind Pigs and started doing the round of advertising agencies and magazines. They were glad to see him back. They were going to do the right thing by the men who had given up their work to go to war. But after all, they had done the work of the war, couldn't drop everyone who had done the work of the war, could they? Ellis said, why no, of course not.

And Ellis, never aggressive in selling his talent, waited for the openings. There was nothing for him to do but wait. He had seen everyone.

Emily saw that Ellis was not comfortable sitting around the room all day. She knew that he was borrowing from his friends, and once or twice, shamefaced, he asked her for cigarette money. That embarrassed him. After that she would leave a five-dollar bill on the dresser two or three times a week. They did not speak of it. "Anything open up yet?" she asked him one evening.

"Not yet."

"Jeff, why don't you go over and see Reynolds at Leighton and Leighton? Go tomorrow. You'll like him."

"All right."

When Emily returned from work the next night, Ellis smiled as he told her the news. He had seen Reynolds, who had not even asked to see any samples but gave him, right off, enough work to bring in about a hundred dollars a month.

"That's grand," Emily said. "I was sure there'd be something for you."

"Were you?" Jeff asked. "How come?"

Emily did not lie. "I called them. Jeff. We do a lot of business with them, and I knew that if I told them about you, well—"

Jeff stopped smiling. "Oh, did you? Oh!"

She came to him. "Don't think of it as a charity job. They wouldn't take you, no matter what I said, if they didn't think you were suited."

"I guess not," Ellis said, but he was no longer interested in talking about his work. "Though he was not earning nearly the money that Emily was, he was making enough for them to begin talking about when they would move to a larger, more comfortable place."

The hotel management decided for them. The management was sorry but Mr. and Mrs. Ellis would have to get rid of their dog or move from the hotel. Some guests were complaining and others wanted to know why they, too, couldn't have a pet.

"The Admiral is my best friend," Ellis told Emily. "I couldn't get along without him."

Emily agreed with Ellis. "Of course we won't leave the Admiral. We'll find a place."
