

INDIGESTION Troubled Him For Two Years

Mr. H. C. Harvey, Novar, Ont., writes: "I have been troubled with indigestion for the last two years. I have taken everything I have seen advertised, but have never had any of them do me so much good as "I have taken six bottles and haven't had an attack since. It is the finest medicine you can take for the blood." Manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

SMILES

"When cremation becomes more popular probably a dust pan will replace the skeleton in the closet."

JUST LIKE US
"Make any New Year resolutions?"
"No—what's the use? I'd only break 'em again!"

A FITTING CELEBRATION
"I believe 1928 is a leap-year, isn't it?"
"Sure, and I'm laying in a big supply of Hops you can bet."

"Wife: Are you swearing off anything?
Hubby: No—just swearing."

NEW ATTACHMENTS
"Has he any new attachments on his car?"
"Yes; almost as many as he has lefts."

SONIA

By VIDA HURST

Sonia repacked her clothes. She was strangely anxious to return to the apartment. After the hotel it would seem like home. Even if Maxine were not there, even though Maxine would never come again. She would go back to her memories of Franklin for these last days. She would sit on the day-enport where he had held her and look for his picture in the leaping flames.

It was noon when she finally opened the door of the room with its bright colors waiting for a human touch. She ran affectionately from one piece of furniture to another. Instead of the loneliness she had dreaded a welcome seemed to creep from the shadows. She patted cushions into place, straightened pictures, cleaned the grate and laid a fresh fire. When the sparks were flying up the chimney she sat down thoughtfully and drank a cup of tea.

That made her remember New Year's day and the tea she had served to Franklin. Walter Henderson's tea. She seemed doomed to ill-starred adventures and misunderstandings with the men she cared for most. But those moments with Franklin had repaid her for everything. Would she ever rest in his arms again? Four months was such a long time. She could only go through with it because in that way she earned her freedom and at the same time made herself more desirable.

Sonia told herself that she understood men. She knew how resistance led them on. She would lose no ground in Franklin's eyes by going home. Something sang triumphantly in her breast. She was leaving him, but he would never give her up.

INSTALLMENT XXVI.

Twilight was falling before Sonia started to collect Maxine's possessions. She knew that most of the prints, cushions and vases which gave the room its color had not belonged to the girl who rented it.

It was pitifully easy to erase the traces of Maxine, her clothes, the toilet articles in the bathroom and a package of letters, which Sonia burned. The paper was dusty and yellow with age. Sonia thought the writing resembled Walter Henderson's. But she would have scorned looking at the signature to find out. Maxine's secret should die with her. As the little packet shriveled and blackened to the edges, she could not help remember her friend's confession. Walter had taken her youth and freshness, the first of her untaken kisses. Maxine seemed to cherish no bitterness against him but she had admitted the necessity since of "some man lurking in the background" while Walter went on his well-bred way, indifferent to the havoc he had wrought.

Sonia found a photograph in the bottom of a drawer. It must have been taken when Maxine first came to Chicago. Her eyes were large and round and innocent, her mouth sensitively full. She had suffered, decided Sonia, before changing into the "hard bodied" woman of the world Sonia had known. But she had been a loyal friend, had tried to give Sonia good advice. The younger girl wiped tears from her eyes as she put the photograph into her own suitcase. Maxine's father would not miss that.

She arranged the rather fussy clothes with little pats of apology. She knew Maxine would not have wanted these things of hers sent to be burdened with it long." Some secret inward perturbation made her say, "Don, you don't seem to consider that I might change while you are away. If my absence will make Franklin appreciate me, why won't yours have the same result with me? Or don't you want it to?"

She could not explain the rush of tears to her eyes.

Don watched her without emotion.

"You are the queerest girl I ever saw. Don't you really know your own heart or are you trying to let me down easy?"

She made no answer. Indeed she could not have explained her reason for clinging to him, her inexplicable desire to run to him from every difficulty.

"Because I don't want your pity," he continued, sternly. "And don't misunderstand me about it."

"It isn't pity for you," she faltered.

"What is it then?"

"Pity for myself—that I haven't courage enough to be the wife I know I could be."

"Sonia, why do you say things like that? You know you don't give a hang for me."

She admitted honestly, "Right this minute I do."

"But the next minute you won't be that the idea?"

She nodded.

"Oh, I appreciate you so much," she cried. "It's Franklin Crane who stands in the way. I'd give anything in the world if when you come back I could love you the way you want me to."

There was no doubting the sincerity of her tone. And the moment Sonia formed the words she knew she had spoken the truth. Her plans for having Franklin seek her to tell her that he loved her seemed unworthy in Don's presence. She realized Don did not understand. His bewilderment was revealed by the startled question he threw to her.

"For Heaven's sake, Sonia, do you know what you're implying?" She flung back her head. Her eyes met his with their old challenge.

"I'd give anything in the world if I could love you."

Don's face lighted with instant passionate desire. He swept her off her feet and into his arms. He kissed her on the mouth, a slow kiss like the one he had given her after their wedding ceremony. Only this time it brought a frightened, reluctant response from Sonia's lips.

He held her away from him crying, "You like that. You wanted to kiss me."

She was amazed at the storm of emotion she had aroused, thrilled in some subtle fashion that was entirely new to her relations with him.

"My dear," he cried, "I've been too careful with you. I should have made love to you long ago, should have fought for you with the weapons other men use. But it seemed like taking an unfair advantage. I dislike winning you with an illusion. A doctor understands how brief a span is allotted to passion, I have held back until I've almost lost you."

The magnetic, fiery sweep of his eyes made Sonia tremble.

In the stress of her excitement she forgot Franklin, forgot everything but the fact that Don Stillwater was capable of making love like this.

He laughed. "I suppose you thought me a cold-blooded proposition. Not like other men."

Her downward expression admitted the justice of his suspicion. (To Be Continued.)

IN MEMORIAM

GORDON AUSTIN INMAN

Mr. and Mrs. John M. Inman will have the heartfelt sympathy of the community in the death of their infant son, Gordon Austin, which took place suddenly at the home of his grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. Donald, A. McLean's, DeSable, on the morning of Dec. 29th, 1927, at the early age of four months and eight days. The little one was a bright, healthy, robust boy, and his sudden death came as a great shock to his parents and grandparents, and his uncles and aunts, for they were much attached to him, even though at so tender an age. But He Who doeth all things, doeth them well. We must not be as those without hope, for our Lord has said: "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for such is the Kingdom of Heaven." The funeral which was largely attended, took place on Friday 30th, to Craupad cemetery.

The service was conducted by Silas Murray and Hector McNevin, Elders of the Church of Scotland. (Patriot Please Copy.)
