A SUITOR TOO MANY

By MILDRED BARBOUR

CHAPTER 17
A FRIGHTENING DISCOVERY

Several weeks passed without the tiniest ripple to mar the tranquility of the young Wares. They were gorgeously and triumphantly happy in each other.
"Wasn't it curious, Dot," Lila remarked one day, "how everything happened at once? The Jackson episode and the ring and all that? My whole life has been that way—never a summer shower, but a deluge." "Thank Heaven, this one's over!"
Dorothy, who was standing at her easel, palette poised in one hand and motioned with the other toward a hideous, grinning god of carved jade above her fireplace.
"Don't let him hear you! The Chinese claim that he brings boast-

Her brain was busy with a plausible explanation as she poured the coffee.

ers to their undoing."
"Poof!" scoffed Lila. "I'm not afraid of your Chinese god. Love is stronger than superstition."
She went away, carrying that thought with her. "Love is stronger than anything in all the world," she said to herself. Therefore, her love for Herbert was stronger than the forces that had seemed to threaten it.
"And it will always be the same! It will never change!" thought Lila. She was surprised to find Herbert already at home.
"Why didn't you tell me you'd be early, darling? I wouldn't have stayed so late at Dot's," she said, as she lifted her lips for his kiss.

There followed several ecstatic moments, after which Herbert asked jealously: "Why do you spend so much time at Dorothy's? Really, Lila, an artist's studio seems to me hardly the place to pass every afternoon when you have so many social duties as my wife."
Lila pressed a gentle finger against his lips.
"Don't be cross, darling, and I'll mix you a new cocktail. Much better than any Sidons can make."
"You learned to make it at Dorothy's, I presume?" he remarked, with lifted brows.
"Heavens, no. Dot doesn't drink!" said Lila.
"Then may I ask who it is—"
Herbert was beginning, but she cut him short with a swift embrace and a delighted laugh.
"You goose! I always made cocktails for Dad at home. He has a book of recipes. Darling, I adore you when you're jealous!"
Slipping his cocktail, Herbert remarked: "Oh, by the way, Varney is coming to dine tonight. His wife's out-that, when the season was over, they must begin to stay at home more; he wanted to catch up on reading and sleep.

The dinner for Jack Varney was excellent. The Wares had a French chef, and he had outdone himself on this particular night. Varney ate with gusto, and then he said: "If May only liked this sort of food, I'd be a happy man. But she's got the foolish idea that the high seasoning of foreign food is put there to hide something. Of course, she's never been abroad," he added with a shrug, and rambled on, dilating on the excellence of the French cuisine; but young Mr. Ware, at his end of the table, glowered in silence at young Mrs. Ware, who flushed and bit her scarlet underlip.
Just before they rose to partake of coffee in the library, Herbert's eyes questioned Lila, mutely, but eloquently. They said plainly: "And what's this rigmorole that Dorothy Caine told about May Varney's foreign romance?"
Lila's answer was a finger on her lips and a warning glance toward Varney. With that, she led the way to the library, thankful that the necessary discussion of Dorothy's story would be postponed for a while, at least.

But her brain was busy with a plausible explanation as she poured the coffee. She was filling Herbert's cup when her straying attention was caught by Varney's heavy voice: "Yes, I think you've a find in that new man, Herb."
"He's not a New Yorker. He has no clients of his own," Herbert objected.
"Never mind. He'll whip into shape. You mark my words. What's his name—I forget?"
"Gilroy Holmes!"
"The sugar-longs slipped from Lila's fingers and fell with a crash, sending the broken fragments of a cup and a flood of hot coffee onto the hearth-rug."
