Youth Rides West

By Will Irwin

"If you hustle out there quick," said the clerk, "you can get a checking job in the grading gang out by Longmount. Friend of mine had it. Happen to know he's quitting today."

"Checking?" I asked.

"Keepin' time on the gang. Hiring and firing—mostly firing, nowadays," said the clerk.

I drove out to Longmount in a rented livery buckboard; making no more of a small matter, I got the job, buckled down to it with all the interest in the world. With the boss, a taciturn and cynical old western whom I never came really to know, I "batched" in a board shack. Uncommunicative as he was, he did teach me something about that essential western art, shooting. He himself handled a 45-caliber Colt with such magic efficiency as to make me suspect that his silence concealed a past. The autumn rains came; there were light snows in the heights above, and they spread over the peaks a bridal veil which with each succeeding storm grew heavier. When it had become a blanket of snow, we finished our job and paid off. I was out of work, and I had forty dollars ahead. Then I had served me another good turn.

Settling up our business with Reichmann, the German grocer from whom we drew our commissary, I found that he needed a clerk. So next morning I was weighing sugar and learning to wrap bundles; and had found on Curtis street a modest boarding place.

There I remained all winter. Denver, in these days, interested me; but after all, it was not the West I had come to see and to live. The West I wanted lay beyond that white mountain barrier.

When spring came, I would go somewhere. It descended upon us suddenly, bringing the cottonwoods to bud overhead, muzzling to an impenetrable morass and unpaved roadways underfoot. And, sharp on that the Rocky Mountain News splashed across its first page the story of a strike at Cottonwood, which I knew as a mining camp, but recently opened, somewhere up in the ranges. I closed out with Reichmann, who nearly wept to see me abandon a good job for the ill-lusory business of mining, and went with my winter savings to Piested's, jumping off place for the dash across the peaks. I intended to proceed by stage. Next neighbor on the floor of a big tent which served as a lodging house, I met Buck, breakfasted with him, reviewed the prospect of reaching Cottonwood in time to stake a decent claim, became intrigued with his honesty, his charily revealed experience, his technical knowledge of his business. Buck was just out of a partner one Shorty, who had come down with him from Idaho, having fallen before the wiles of woman and taken himself a wife in Denver. Hesitatingly I made bold to propose that we join forces, adding that I had a little money. For this contingency, I felt, justified me in dipping into my mother's fund. Buck accepted with a promptness which in him amounted to eagerness. So, a day later, we were toiling behind our jack-trains toward Cottonwood.

"This digging along Bear creek," "Beer!" exclaimed Buck. "Say, a was, therefore, my first encounter with actual, hard, physical work. through the canvas door. Siegel, in And when the fascination of gold his haste to get custom, had not den sand began to pall, I realized, taken the trouble to floor his tent.

Along the farther end ran two long tables, each bearing kegs. Bartenders in blue shirts, working like mad while the harvest lasted, were drawing full steins, setting them forth along the tables, making change, chucking the receipts into a box. And the crowd before the tables, each bearing kegs. Bartend-chance at the beverage which is the special saloos of overworked tissues.

We got to our tables at last; our foaming beer stood before us and Buck was in the act of paying, when a hand shot from behind under his arm, seized his schooner I wheeled. A man as short and squatly as some marine monster stood drinking Buck's beer. Over the rim of the schooner shone a pair of black eyes that glistened humorously; and his marine resemblance was pointed by a moustache, now flecked with foam, which dropped above an aggressive chin like that of a sea lion. Buck's eyes snapped with resentment; then his expression changed and he broke into a string of exclamations which I cannot here transcribe. "—Shorty, you hamstrung old hoss, you!" it ended.
