FOR THE WOMAN READER BY FLORENCE RIDDICK BOYS

VALUE OF HOUSEKEEPING

Most men believe that they are "supporting" their wives and this gives to the man a dominating attitude and to the woman a humble gratefulness. The man does support his wife in a way that an employer supports his employees, by providing work for them. If a married man with a family loses his wife, he finds that he has to pay much more to get his home kept than it cost him to "support" his wife, and the work was done so well, and there is not so much interest in it, and no contribution of love and spirit and atmosphere to the family and home life—all of which a wife puts into her housekeeping.

It is a beautiful attitude for a wife to feel grateful to her lord for the home he "provides" her—but it is unfair to him to feel that he is doing a noble charity in "keeping" her, and that she should cringe toward him a little bit on that account. It is partly this labor of love—housekeeping—with all means of family life and motherhood, which brings down the recognition of the value of woman's work outside the home. In business life a woman is expected to work for less than a man, in teaching—where she is 95% of a profession—and in the store and office. There is some justice in this, in cases where the man assumes a heavier part of the load and does things which could not be asked of a woman, or if a man has spent longer in preparation for the job and is more of a specialist or more capable, and there is reason in it if the man is the sole source of income for a family. But very often it is unjust, especially if the woman is as capable—and does better—as the man.

Man and woman in the home should realize that house keeping is no slouch of a job. It requires brains and experience and much labor. Besides this, the average housekeeper puts much into it, much of heart and soul and after-hours effort, which money could not buy. The dignity of house-keeping, and its inestimable value and necessity as a background for family should receive greater recognition, else home life—the basis of national welfare and human welfare—will go on the rocks. Woman will not forever be the patient, dumb animal who is willing to throw her heart and soul into a work which is not appreciated—especially in this age when she is so capable of holding a high place in the business world.

Color On The Table.

Some time ago I bought what I regard as a beautiful set of dishes, for about third its usual price, because the pattern was being discontinued at the wholesale house. It was a dainty set, of beautiful lines, with pink rose bud decorations. The style today is bizarre and gaudy and these would be considered anemic. Colour has come into our homes with a flair and invaded our dining table, hitherto the haven of peace, refinement and conservatism.

The dining table of today is regaled in loud colours, rose, red, green, orange, black, unmodified and strong. The tablecloth itself is far from snowy white. It may be a strong blue or orange. The goblets are coloured. There are coloured canes, sticks and candles and the dishes may run the whole spectrum, or they may be all one dashing color.

The bath room and kitchen have gone the way of the rest of the houses and we have gay colors invading even the bathtub and the kitchen sink, which may be green or yellow instead of gleaming white.

Individual Towels.

eral children, they will get out clean towels more frequently than, is necessary and drop them about, and then the next person who wants a towel is afraid that one, not knowing who put it there or how soiled it is. A good way to make each member of the family feel a responsibility about towels and also distinguish which towel belongs to which, is to buy each member of the family four towels of one kind and different from those of the other. He can then recognize his own towels and feel a proprietorship in them and will guard them more carefully. If he finds one out of place, he will not think it belongs to someone else and be afraid to use it himself, and this saves laundry work.

Liver.

Liver used to be the despised portion of the pie, but since its uses as a vitamin food has been thoroughly advertised, it has risen to a higher place in public favor; also in the price list. But there is liver and liver. Do you know the difference in quality of different kinds of liver?

The butcher tells me that veal liver is the best, though usually twice as expensive as some kinds. Beef liver comes next and pork liver is the least desirable.

Bacon is a favorite combination with liver, since liver lacks fat and flavor. To cook liver, put it in a pan of cold water to cover and par-boil it for a minute. Fry the fat out of the bacon and cook the liver in it slowly, so as not to make it hard and dry. Cover the liver to keep the steam in and cook it through without drying it out too much.

The Dish Scraper.

One of the most all-round convenient articles in my kitchen is the little three cornered rubber plate scraper. It has a handle on it and I keep it just over my kitchen sink, always within reach. Being rubber, it yields and fits almost anything, and is washable, and seems to adapt itself to all sorts of odd uses.

When washing vegetables, I use it to poke them around and scrape off the first layer of dirt, just in a general way not handling each individual vegetable. It saves the hands! When the dishes are brought from the table, I set them under the faucet and scrape off or out each, hurriedly with this convenient device, as I pile them up for washing. Then I continue to use it to collect all the garbage in the sink and lift it into the garbage pail, thus refraining from touching it with my hands.

If ever any little things, such as lemon seeds or refuse from the dish water, get into the sink, I shove them over toward the drain, with the dish scraper, push them about until the liquid has drained out, then lift them out with this little convenience. Nobody likes to dive into the sink after such rubbish, with his fingers. It is a little to work the watery part of sour milk, a spoiled can of tomatoes or fruit or any other disagreeable thing thru the sink drain this way.

Fashions, Fads, Foibles.

Style experts say that skirts really are to be worn longer. Even sport skirts are to fall a modest four inches below the knee. Afternoon skirts are to be longer and fuller, and an uneven hemline. The modes are becoming more feminine and elaborate and the sport frock will be restricted to morning or sports wear. The more formal afternoon dress is something new in our wardrobe.

Lace is used a great deal, alone for evening dresses and the more formal afternoon dress, and as trimming with other materials. Woolens are very popular. They may be warm for hot weather, but are sleeveless and do not call for much underneath them. If you buy a woolen dress, get it a little larger, as it is almost bound to shrink a little.

Stiff, crisp silks and satins are used in the full flounced evening dresses. Gay cotton prints are coming into their own again. Women and girls are wearing dimities, lawns, voiles, and prints like our mothers, calicoes, made up in all sorts of dainty styles, for the porch, for housedresses, and even for the bank. They are the very minimum of expense, but nobody seems to care, since they are so gay and pretty.

Mrs. Solomon Sa's:

Put a bit of poetry above your kitchen sink. While your hands are indignantly busy, scouring last night's stew-pan, your mind and soul can revel in beauty.
