"A Guy Named Joe" Tops Thrills With Romance And Love

In the film now playing at the Prince Edward Theatre one of the characters explains the title as "any guy who is a right guy, is a guy named Joe," and all the men in the American Air Force garlanded in the movie, "A Guy Named Joe," are right guys. The film pivots around the old superstition that "pilots never die."

"A Guy Named Joe" is the story of our airmen, their loves and cares and brings to the screen one of the most heartwarming romances ever filmed. Pete Sandidge, played by Spencer Tracy, is a reckless and daredevil pilot. His work is characterized by a disregard for his own safety, much to the despair of his superior officers and to Dorinda Duncan, played by Miss Dunne, a Ferry Command pilot, who loves him desperately. Their love affair is marred by petty quarrels engendered by Dorinda's worry. Finally Pete agrees to return to the United States as an instructor, but before his departure he is sent on a reconnaissance mission. He goes to his death homing an enemy transport.

He awakens to find himself in a strange place, the "heaven" of dead airmen. Here he learns from "The General," played by Lionel Barrymore, that he has a new job, that of aiding young student pilots to become proficient airmen. Pete's charge specifically is young Van Johnson. Unseen by any mortal, Pete sits with Van as he flies and Pete teaches him all of his tricks. Soon traits of his personality begin to appear in Van. When Van is assigned to combat duty in New Guinea, Pete follows. There he finds Dorinda again, still grieving for him until she falls in love with Van, mainly because he is Pete all over again. After a thrilling climax, during which Dorinda carries out a dangerous mission, she returns safely to Van and a happy future life, and Pete returns to the "General" for another assignment content with what he has done.

Cowboy Star Trio In Western Drama

Three of the screen's outstanding western heroes, in the persons of Hoot Gibson, Ken Maynard and Bob Steele, are the featured players in "Arizona Whirlwind," the thrilling Monogram "Trail Blazers" drama which comes to the Empire Theatre tonight. Myrna Dell plays the leading feminine role, and other members of the cast are Ian Keith, Don Stewart, Charles King, Karl Hackett, Charles Murray, Jr., George Chesebro, Dan White and Frank Ellis. The picture was produced and directed by Robert Tansey, and the original screenplay was written by Frances Kavanaugh.

WINS $10,000 HOUSE — Mr. Alfred Edward Kelly, Ottawa, formerly of Charlottetown, was the lucky winner last week of a $10,000 house which he won in a draw on a one dollar ticket in an Ottawa Rotary Club drive. Mr. Kelly, who is a son of Mrs. James Kelly, Charlottetown, is a bachelor and he states that he has already received "three offers of marriage and an equal number of proposals to take his newly won house off his hands." The winning ticket was drawn before 2,500 people by Major General LaFleche, Minister of National War Services. More than 40,000 tickets had been sold in the campaign to persons all over Canada. Mr. Kelly hadn't seen his prize when he was wakened out of bed with the news that he was the winner. An employee of the Federal Department of Agriculture, he is well known here, where his many friends will be pleased to learn of his good fortune.

Large Lobsters Increasing Under New Regulation

OTTAWA, July 26 — Officers of the Department of Fisheries said today that reports show that in nearly all parts of fishing district No. 7, which includes the north shore of Prince Edward Island and some other stretches of the provincial coast, large lobsters have been increasing since the adoption, several years ago, of the regulation requiring that any lobsters of less than seven inches which are taken must be returned at once to the water, alive. On the other hand, in one particular area, where there has been some tendency to disregard the regulation, the average size of lobsters taken is not showing such an increase.

The officials said that in view of the clear evidence of the beneficial effect of the regulation where it is observed (and the equally clear evidence of adverse effect where the size limit has not been sufficiently respected) it is the intention to proceed vigorously against any one who does not comply fully with the regulation in future.

In this connection the officers said that the Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island had recently upheld the department's interpretation of the size limit regulation as requiring that undersized lobsters must be returned at once to the waters where they were caught. The Court's decision was given in a case in which the department had appealed from a judgment by a Magistrate who had dismissed a charge against an Island fisherman of having 'short' lobsters in his possession.

When seized by a fishery officer the lobsters involved in the case were in the fisherman's boat, which he had brought to shore. In Magistrate's court the fisherman's defence, in substance, was that he had brought the lobsters ashore to measure them and that he had intended to return them to the water later in the day but that seizure had made it impossible to carry out his intention. The department, on the other hand, took the ground that under the regulation any undersized lobsters must be put back into the waters where they are caught as soon as they are caught, and not at some later time, or some other place. The actual wording of the regulation is that any undersized lobster or lobsters "that may accidentally be caught shall be returned forthwith alive and uninjured to the waters from which it, or they, were taken."

The Magistrate accepted the defence, taking the view that there has been evidence of intent to make substantial compliance with the regulations. The Supreme Court, however, reversed his decision and entered a conviction against the fisherman. The judgment upholds the departmental stand as to the regulation's meaning.
