The Iron Horse

"I am not offering you a reward Mr. Brandon. I am offering you a career. In the years to come, the Union Pacific will need men of your stamp, square men, resolute men, loyal men. I take more pleasure than I can express in inviting you to accept the superintendency of the mountain division. Mr. Marsh assures me that you are well qualified. General Dodge corroborates that opinion. My friend Crocker, who has just extracted $10,000 from my purse, warns me on pain of physical violence, not to tamper with you. That decides me, Mr. Brandon. If for no other reason than that I owe Crocker one, I mean to have you."

Davy stared breathless. He could not believe his ears. To become superintendent of the great mountain division! His own country! And at this time! His eyes found Miriam's, bright with pride. He tried to make a fitting reply, but the words wouldn't come. He could only take Doctor Durant's cool white hand with an awkward: "I accept, sir—I am proud—" "That settles it," said Doctor Durant, swiftly. "I turn you over to Mr. Marsh. He will discuss your duties with you, issue the necessary instructions—all that." With a graceful gesture he dismissed details. "I am glad to know you, Mr. Brandon. We will keep an eye on you in New York."

He bowed, caught Dodge's eye and led the way to his private car. Miriam's eyes flashed proudly as she caught Davy's hand. "Oh, it's wonderful!" she cried. "Davy, it's the lifework you have longed for. It was what your father would have wished. It's heaven—"

IT WON'T KEEP FINE FOR EVER

John Bull: "I'll have to get this recovered—its wearing thin." The Optomists: "Don't waste your money; it ain't gonna rain no mo." From the Western Mail, Cardiff.

Stourbridge fair is one of the oldest institutions of its kind in England. Stourbridge is near the famous University town of Cambridge and the charter for its fair was formerly granted in perpetuity by Henry VIII, and reckoned, in Shakespeare's day, to be the largest fair in Europe. It was followed by another famous autumn fair at Ely, which is of interest as having enriched our language by an epithet. At this Fair of St. Audry (as St. Etheldreda was affectionately called) a cheap kind of necklace was sold bearing her name, in time becoming known as "tawdry laces," which were alluded to by Shakespeare and other writers of his day. Thus, in a work called "My Lady's Looking Glass," 1616, the author laments the passing of a happy age when a man could woo his wench at no more expense than a pair of gloves, a thimble, or a tawdry lace. In time the epithet, "tawdry" came to mean any such piece of glittering tinsel as the fairns provide to this day.

Had Diogenes visited this country while on his famous hunt, some get-rich-quick promoter would have swiped his lantern.

"I couldn't bear to marry anybody but a railroad man." "Who's this?" said Marsh. "What's this I hear from my shameless child?" "Oh, daddy, we do love each other. We have both made mistakes, but that's over, forever and ever." "Now let me see," said Marsh, "you came to the car with Schultz and young Dinky at his heels. Ca-sey, with the resplendent glory of service for both roads, had been paying supercilious visits to the U. P. camp, escorted like a mandarin by a grinning squad of his own Celestials." "Who wants a trousseau? If Davy will have me I'll marry him in my most tattered old rags." "Sure an' they're out there now, the Oryntal divvies, 'tis 'Bossee Pattee, 5 from marnin' till night, 'Bossee Pattee, grinnin' like yelly apes. But they're grand byes, Miss Miriam. What's this I hear, Davy, about yer becomin' priding of the U. P. Pay? What it is, Mister Brandon, ye'll not have me behind. Well ye know, ye laughin' divvie, that ye'd amount to nawthin' widout me!" "You're going, Pat," assured Miriam, and the Irishman grinned his inimitable impudent grin. "Tis plain to see who's the boss of the new carperation," he said. "Restrain yourself, Davy. Don't strike me, you brute." He fled from the car, shouting orders to his escort. Davy and Miriam arose from the table and went to the platform. Lights gleamed from the windows of the private cars, and the sounds of revelry rose and fell. As they stood, his arm around her, her hand in his, the blinding moon was glorifying the night. Softly, serenely, the golden goddess leveled her wand at the glittering pathway which stretched before them, the shining pathway to the future, the pathway of love. (The End.)
