MISS BROWN OF X. Y. O.

By E. Philipps Oppenheim (Copyright 1927 by E. Philipps Oppenheim)

THE parlor maid who brought up Miss Brown's tray later on in the evening was more communicative than usual. She told Miss Brown of the General's visit, and made a few comments thereon. On the subject of the dinner which she had served below, however, she was almost eloquent. "I've waited on gentlemen of all sorts for the last ten years," she declared, "but never in my life have I seen any one drink like the foreign gentleman and his friends. Her Ladyship's quite moderate herself, but they finished three bottles of champagne for dinner, after starting with a bottle of sauterne, and the best part of a bottle of vermouth before they sat down. "And eating—why the thin little foreign gentleman reminded me of nothing but a wolf. They've just had in a fresh pot of coffee another bottle of brandy, and I've telephoned to the station for a taxi to catch the 12:30 train. How they'll ever get into it I don't know. You'll ring if you want anything, Miss."

"I'm sure I shan't, thanks," Miss Brown replied. "I'll leave my tray outside."

The maid took her leave and Miss Brown dined with a book propped up in front of her. A sense of excitement which she did not altogether understand affected her appetite to some extent, and as soon as she had concluded a slight meal and drunk one glass of wine she put the tray outside and, turning down her light, made her way to the window.

The Nook was the last of a row of irregular, detached villas situated at the end of a newly made boulevard, which she did not know, but which was a rough belt of headland leading to some small pine woods. Although it was not without a taint of suburbanism it was a lonely spot indeed, owing to the stretch of open country upon which it bordered.

Miss Brown sat there waiting and listening, and in due course her long vigil was rewarded. A tall, solitary figure emerged from the gloom which hung over the bloom, opened the gate of the Nook and made his way toward the back door. He was apparently admitted without question and for some time afterward everything went on as usual. From the main road, some distance away, one could hear the clanging of the electric cars, from the railway came the occasional shrill whistle of a locomotive, from downstairs in the dining room came the frequent rumble of voices.

The boulevard seemed empty. Miss Brown began to wonder whether that telephone message, so urgently demanded from her, had miscarried, whether some "uninterested" person had received the information that Lady Hamerton's box of books from the Times Library had arrived by the 6:33 train and had been duly delivered.

And then her heart gave a little start. Without any sign of approach, without any sound of which she was conscious, she realized that a man was standing at the side entrance, another at the front path, another in the garden, another out in the street, men as like one another as sheep, for they all wore khaki, and they all carried bayonets. Among the little company in the dining room into which Thornton had made his unexpected entrance there was instantaneous dismay. In alarm, Lady Hamerton, too, was obviously disturbed. "Didn't you get my message, Mr. Thornton?" she asked. "I telephoned to the number you gave me begging you not to come to-night."

"I got the message," Thornton replied. "I came all the same. What's wrong?" "For one thing Mr. Malakoff and Mr. Frankland are here," Lady Hamerton explained quickly. "They mustn't be associated with this. And for another, the whole business has got to end altogether for a time. The general has been down here. I have orders to leave the neighborhood. The house is suspected."

"I've been a soldier," Thornton rejoined shortly. "I don't quit my job because it's dangerous. As for those two," he went on, glowing across at Malakoff and his companion, "they are in the game. If there's danger why shouldn't they share it?"

"You're talking like a fool, Thornton," Frankland exclaimed harshly. "You leave your work and go home. You're a dangerous man, but you're not the suitable person for it. This house is suspected and if you're caught here tonight and it comes out that Malakoff and I were here there'll be the devil to pay. Chuck it. Get away where you came from. Leave the house this minute."

"Quickly!" Malakoff insisted. Thornton laughed scornfully. He picked up the brandy decanter, poured himself out half a wine-glassful and tossed it off. "You're a chicken-livered pair of comrades," he declared. "What I'm going to do is this. I'm going to the kitchen and I'm going to take out two amfuls of my placards and carry them across the back to where I've left my motorcycle, and no one's going to stop me. Tomorrow they'll be on every tree and wall between here and Wokingham. So that's that!"

He swung round on his heel and left the room. They heard his footsteps in the passage. Malakoff was standing up nervously clutching at his beard. "The man is mad!" he exclaimed. "Mad! I should have thought after your telephone message he'd have had the sense to stay away. My overcoat and hat quick! Come on, Frankland! We'll walk to the station."

"I think you're wise," Lady Hamerton agreed. "What a fool the man is! He calls it courage, I suppose. I'll show you where your things are."

They hurried out into the passage, and afterward Lady Hamerton herself opened the front door for them and stood watching while they stumbled down the narrow path. At the gate, however, a tall figure loomed out of the darkness. "You're not allowed to pass for the present, sir," a man in uniform told them. "Why not?" Frankland demanded. "What's wrong and who are you?"

"I'm a sergeant of the Military Police, sir," the man replied. "The house is being searched. Until the officer in charge or the police sergeant with him gives permission no one is allowed to leave." "But we want to catch a train," Malakoff protested. "We've just been dining with Lady Hamerton." "Sorry, sir," the man regretted. "You will doubtless have permission to leave in a few minutes." "The door was open again, Lady Thornton stood there framed in the little shaft of light. "What is it?" she asked anxiously. "The two men made their way back to the house and into the dining room without speech. "It's that fool Thornton's let us in for this," Malakoff muttered. "He's done for himself, too. The police are in the house, or the military, or some one." Lady Hamerton subsided into a chair with a smothered cry. Malakoff, with trembling fingers, filled

Prince Edward Island Lady Used Dodd's Kidney Pills Mrs. C. D. Maye Feels Like a New Person After Using Dodd's Kidney Pills

Western Cove Head, P. E. I. March 19.—(Special)—Thousands of women who seemed destined to a life of frequent suffering have been freed entirely from their ailments by using Dodd's Kidney Pills. Mrs. Cecil D. Maye, a well-known resident of this place, suffered with her kidneys. She writes: "I have used several boxes of Dodd's Kidney Pills and found great relief in them. I suffered with backache for six months. I thought I would try Dodd's Kidney Pills and am thankful I did, for the pain in my back has all gone. I feel like a new person. I always keep a box on hand. I must say I cannot speak too highly of Dodd's Kidney Pills. It is on account of the good work that they occupy such a prominent place in the family medicine chest. So many of the ordinary, everyday ills come from sick kidneys. Rheumatism, backaches, lumbago, urinary troubles and heart disease can be traced directly or indirectly to sick kidneys."

Somehow or other, Winter with its icy, snowy, rut-filled streets is regarded as the most difficult season for the automobile tire. Experts, however, upon this thought so readily accepted by the average car-owner. They point out that although the streets are not so good as to surface, nevertheless they permit the tires to run cool, which is much to be desired. Friction, after all, is lower in Winter? That is the cause of the skidding.

THEY NEED ATTENTION Repair shops and dealer service establishments report they still are making a profit on the motorist's indifference to the lubrication of front-wheel bearings. Because these units rarely require the addition of fresh grease, it seems that many car owners assume they never need any. This attitude is costly. While many replacement parts are found to cost less than anticipated, bearings do not come under this heading. They are reasonably priced but are not low-priced, and the failure to lubricate them will prove most unwise. MUST BE WORTH WHILE Looking over the latest model automobiles should indicate many things to the person who must get along a while longer with the old car. For instance, there is the matter of the gear shift lever. On the new models, it comes right up to the steering wheel, where reaching it is a matter of a few inches. There is a device that serves this purpose for the older car to be found in almost every accessory shop. They must be worth while or so many new cars would not have similar features.

CHAIN EQUALIZES HELP One Winter-driving accessory that fails to attract the attention it deserves is the chain equalizer. This unit, which fits outside the wheel, keeps the chain from bunching and yet lets the same time does not take up the slack to a point that prevents the chain from creeping on the tire. An important proportion of the skidding that occurs even on the chain-protected car is due to the bunching of the links in one spot. Equalizers make the chain investment that much stronger.

GLYCERINE STILL GOOD The glycerine anti-freeze which will be removed from a host of cars within the next few weeks should not be thrown away as worthless. Properly drained from the cooling system and stored with reasonable care, it will be good for the Winter that is many months away. This is one of the special virtues of this variety of anti-freeze and the motorist would do well to capitalize upon it.

ANOTHER TIME OF CHANGE The coming of Spring necessitates thought for the lubricant in various features of the car—crankcase, transmission, and differential particularly. In all of these, it is likely that a lighter oil has been used during the months of cold weather now passing. The return of higher temperatures will call for a heavier lubricant, particularly in the differential and transmission housings. In refilling them, it will be found advisable to thoroughly flush the parts before adding the fresh oil or grease.

SOME ADJUST SELVES Self-adjusting generators are employed on several makes of cars. The car owner who has acquired one of these specific cars during the Winter may not be aware of this fact. To attempt to change the adjustment to provide for a lower charge rate will throw the device out of line. Check-up with the instruction book or the service station manager before indulging in this form of repair work.

FUNNY, BUT IT'S TRUE Funny, but it's true, Winter with its icy, snowy, rut-filled streets is regarded as the most difficult season for the automobile tire. Experts, however, upon this thought so readily accepted by the average car-owner. They point out that although the streets are not so good as to surface, nevertheless they permit the tires to run cool, which is much to be desired. Friction, after all, is lower in Winter? That is the cause of the skidding.
