LITTLE HEARD NOW OF GERMAN GAS ATTACKS

PARIS, Feb. 15.—(Correspondence of The Associated Press)—Very little is heard of the effects of suffocating gas at the front, though the official communique frequently mentions attacks in which it has been used. The report says that 5,000 French soldiers succumbed to it in the Argonne through neglect to distribute protecting masks, seems to have been forgotten and in the absence of other reported casualties anxiety seems to have disappeared. Abbe Moreaux, director of the Bourges observatory, explains why the Germans are at a great disadvantage on account of the winds, and how the allies could dominate them in that kind of warfare if they saw fit.

The battlefield, excepting between Noyen and Verdun, runs in a generally northerly-southerly direction, the rest of it east and west, while the north of France and Belgium are all the year round subjected to general Atlantic winds; that is to say, winds varying between west and southwest. The central meteorological bureau statistics, show that only 28 times in 100 during the entire winter on an average has the wind blown from the east, southeast or northeast consequently in the winter season a German gas attack has only 28 chances in a hundred of success, while an attack by the allies with the same army has 72 chances in 100 on the fronts running from north to south. On the front running from east to west the conditions are less favorable to the allies, the north wind being in the ratio of 30 in 100 in winter, and 40 in 100 in spring, 38 to 100 in summer and 28 in 100 in autumn."

Summing up his calculations, Abbe Moreaux thinks the Germans have less than one chance in three the year round, while the Allies have more than two chances in three of effective use of suffocating.
