Served at Magnetic Hill near Moncton N.B.

MOST people who visit Magnetic Hill, near Moncton, N.B., stop at "The Shanty" tearoom for pancakes, a specialty of Miss Muriel Lutes, who is in charge of the tearoom.

"SOME people haven't the knack of making good pancakes," Miss Lutes says. "Our forebears liked them thin, but plentiful, and they liked them served with country sausage or swimming in maple syrup. They are to New Brunswick what beans are to Boston. But, to make good pancakes, you need good flour. Being cooked quickly, it is important to have a fine flour with plenty of 'body' to it, and to my mind there is no flour like Robin Hood for making tasty pancakes."

Her Pancake Secret

"When tourists ask me how I make my pancakes, I always tell them to use Robin Hood Flour. That is my secret not only for pancakes but for all good baking. We have used Robin Hood as long as I can remember for cakes, pies, bread, and, in fact, for all our baking. It is certainly the favourite in this part of the country."

Water-Washed and Guaranteed

Robin Hood Flour carries in each bag a "money-back plus 10%" guarantee certificate. The certificate authorizes your dealer to return your money plus 10 per cent if you do not find that Robin Hood gives you absolute satisfaction in all your baking. Robin Hood is milled from the finest Western wheat and all the wheat is water-washed before being milled into Robin Hood Flour. Order a bag to-day and you'll find that Robin Hood Flour will make your baking lighter and finer with less effort.

HOW TO BLEACH UNWANTED HAIRS

There's a tremendous difference between superfluous hair and that which is unwanted. Superfluous refers to a too abundant growth of hair, which may appear on the face, arms, legs or along the natural hairline. Unwanted hairs are those which grow naturally on the body and which can be removed from under the arms by shaving or the use of a good depilatory, or which may be bleached so that they are scarcely noticeable.

To bleach unwanted hairs, simply make a paste of chalk of magnesium (ask your druggist for magnesium carbonate), peroxide and a few drops of ammonia. The proportions are: Two tablespoonfuls of chalk of magnesium, two drops of ammonia and enough peroxide to make a smooth paste. After washing the area to be bleached with soap and water, rinse off all soap and drying the skin, smooth the paste over the hairy area. Let the paste remain on until dry, then rinse off with lukewarm water.

This method of bleaching unwanted or congested hairs may be used as often as necessary. If the skin feels the least bit dry after removing the bleach, smooth any greasy cream over the newly bleached region.

RENAISSANCE OF LINGERIE NECKWEAR

Sheer, fine organizes and mouseline de soie, Venise and Val lace, delicate laces and crystal beaded, exquisite embroideries have been fashioned in billowy, frothy collars and cuffs in the present rage for lingerie accessories.

Bell-shaped ruffle cuffs come from beneath sleeves, falling with flattery over hands or elbows. Pleatons of Venise lace edged in finely pleated lace are finished with a magenta velvet bow. Long, tight sleeves of Appenzel-type embroidery give the 1900 look when coming from under short sleeves.

All this delicate and lovely neckwear has been designed to wear on today's charming prints and pastels. On a simple dinner dress, collars and cuffs add a touch of 1900 elegance, so smart for summer 1940.

THE ONLY WAY

Not one of the ordinary tests used by laymen to detect poisonous mushrooms is absolutely safe. The only sure method is to know the various species by sight.

Waffles are grand for dessert when topped with cream cheese mixed with cherry or blueberry jam. Be generous with both the cheese and jam. No need for butter, as the cheese is rich enough.

When it is necessary to use milk instead of cream on cereals, or in coffee, scald it first and then serve hot; it will give the effect of cream.

HANDKERCHIEFS

So complex has been the evolution of the social order that even the everyday handkerchief, which may be somewhat less plentiful under the new linen and cotton restrictions, can boast quite an interesting and even romantic history. The credit of its invention has been ascribed to the ancient Persians, who are recorded to have used small squares of silk differently as table napkins and nose-wipers as occasion required. From Persia the handkerchief passed to Greece, and thence to Rome, and after a long interval, to northern Europe.

Not until the eighteenth century, however, does it seem to have found favour outside the ranks of the wealthy and noble-born, and indeed, sumptuary laws in Germany at one time forbade its use by anyone below a certain rank. The growth of snuff-taking in the eighteenth century is said to have popularized it with the general public in England. At one time handkerchiefs seem to have been of all shapes and sizes, but in January, 1785, Louis XVI of France, at the instigation of Marie Antoinette, solemnly decreed that the length of the handkerchief shall equal its breadth henceforth throughout the kingdom; and this for a long time determined its dimensions not only in France but over here.

LET DOCTOR MAKE ALL BITING REMARKS

If in spite of regular, proper manicures, a child continues to bite her nails, take her to your family doctor, by all means. Whatever you do, don't discuss the biting habit from your mind with the thought that she'll outgrow it. She probably will outgrow it, but meanwhile, she may injure permanently the shape of her fingertips.

When she is five or six, she ought to be taught to brush her nails when she washes her hands before going to bed. Brushing also stimulates circulation and, of course, makes for absolute cleanliness. In the morning and again at noon, she ought to clean underneath each nail with an orange stick—never with a sharp metal instrument.

Furthermore, she should massage hand lotion into fingers and wrists as well as hands several times a day after washing. This is very important.

A Morning Smile

"That dentist wasn't painless, as you told me," said Tommy.

"Why dear, d'd he hurt you?" asked his mother.

"No, but he yelled when I bit his finger," was the reply.

They were discussing a certain M.P.

"The trouble with him," observed the cynic, "is that he lacks too modest a view of his own insignificance."

Southern Atlantic Legacy

By SYDNEY PARKMAN

"Good-night — and good luck to the new venture!" the priest responded, and he began to make his way back through the village.

The captain watched his portly form melt into the gloom, and then set out on his interrupted ascent of the rough track that led up to his own house.

It was now completely dark save for the star-shine and once under nothing.

He knew the path well enough, however, and he stepped along it with no hesitation.

A hedge bounded the garden belonging to his house, and as he reached the gap where the gate hung, he noticed with some surprise that no light was showing from within.

As he did so, he thought he heard a sound of someone on the inside, and he peered into the intense darkness, with his own figure silhouetted against the starry sky.

"Marjui!" he called.

There was no answer and after a moment he stepped inside and groped his way toward the table on the edge of the lamp.

He had replaced the shade and was in the act of turning up the wick when his eye was caught by slight movement among the shadows on the opposite side of the room.

"Good evening, Cap!" he said coolly. "How's tricks? No; don't go acting hasty; for I'm kind of nervous and I want to have an accident right now! Just sit down and make yourself at home, won't you."

CHAPTER III VISITOR WITH A PISTOL

The man came slowly into the room as he spoke, and the captain saw that he was holding a heavy automatic pistol in his right hand, with its muzzle trained upon his chest.

There was a suggestion of feline stealth in his movements as he advanced slowly towards the other side of the table. He was shabbily dressed in a dust-coloured linen suit, and wore a cheap "mammoth" hat. His age might have been anything between 35 and 40.

"You'd best not to remember me, Cap?" he remarked pleasantly, as he came to a halt within a couple of feet of the other side of the table. "I must have changed a lot in the last few years."

At that, the captain found his voice.

"Remember you all right, Steiner," he said slowly. "So you're the fellow who was noising round the village after me, are you? Well, what do you want? And what have you done with my housekeeper?"

The man's smile broadened, and he sank into a chair.

"Why, she's been entertaining a couple of old friends of yours in the kitchen while the cook was out, for you, he explained easily. "Come right in, boys!" he called. The Cap's wild to know you!"

The shuffling of feet from the adjoining room, and a moment later two more men came in through the doorway. One was the yellow-faced man who had recognized the captain in Antilla, and the second was a short, powerfully-built fellow, with a scowling, heavy face.

The yellow-faced man raised his hand in laudatory salute as he entered and "How's it coming, Cap?" he asked cheerfully.

The other man merely nodded and grinned.

The captain looked at them both with the same impassive face, and then turned to their leader.

"Well," he said, "What's it all about? What have you come here for, and what's the idea of making free with my house?"

"Why, it's a little surprise party," the other told him calmly. "Lefty, here, saw you in Antilla a week ago, and he says the cook is on his way, so we thought we'd come out and say howdy. I must say though, you don't look like you're glad to see us. You aren't at hospitable as we'd hope."

"Glad to see you!" the captain echoed with a short barking laugh. "I never was partial to rattlesnakes."

The short, swarthy man moved a pace forward with a growl, but Steiner checked him with a gesture.

"Don't get sore, Frenchy!" he admonished him softly. "The Cap don't mean anything by that, do you, Cap? He's not got his bearings properly yet. Let's fix things comfortably and see if we can't get together. Lefty, the step out on to the veranda and see that we don't get interrupted. Take a seat, Cap. You, too, Frenchy."

The amiable Lefty took up a position on the veranda where he could watch all that went on inside the room, and the other fellow drew a chair up to the end of the table. The captain remained standing eyeing Steiner with the same impassive though watchful expression on his face.

"I'm still waiting to hear what you've come here for," the captain told him coldly. "Let's have it. And the sooner you beat it the better I'll be pleased."

Steiner shook his head reproachfully.
