ZORA The Invisible By J. R. WILMOT

"I shall be interested to know how you get along," Winstanley told him, as they parted. "You mustn't think that because I'm cloistered up here I'm quite out of touch with reality. We're not all mummified at the British Museum."

Blayne walked along Museum Street with a feeling of elation, but why he should have felt elated he did not know. Although Winstanley had told him a great deal, what he now knew did not bring him any nearer solving the mystery of Montgomery Gaynor's death—unless—Heaven! What a mutt he had been! What if Montgomery Gaynor had at, some time or other been in India and got mixed up with this formidable secret society!

At the corner of Woburn Square he stopped abruptly. He was on the right track at last. This was nothing more than a fanciful crime of revenge—the culmination of an Eastern vendetta. Sonia Gaynor was innocent and so probably was the unknown young man she was shielding. Down at "Red Gables" he would probably find the solution—at "Red Gables" with Mrs. Morrison and her rather attractive daughter.

Hailing a passing taxi-cab, Blayne jumped in and told the driver to get him to Half Moon Street as quick'y as the maze of traffic regulations would permit. The driver, with one eye on Blayne's apparent eagerness and the other on his prosperous appearance, nodded intelligently.

Blayne found that he had been at the Museum longer than he imagined, and it was nearly five o'clock when he entered his flat to find the punctilious Hooker opening the door.

"A gentleman to see you, sir," he announced. "Come! Out ten minutes ago. Most persistent fellow, sir. Said he must see you, and that he'd wait."

"Good!" murmured Blayne as Hooker took his hat. Carefully closing the door behind him, Blayne saw Roper rise from a chair and place a newspaper on the table at his elbow.

"I didn't expect you back quite so soon, Roper," said Blayne. "Nothing doing, I suppose. Wasn't the lady's afternoon out, eh?"

"On the contrary sir, it was," answered the bright young man from Scotland Yard whom Inspector Webster had "loaned" to Blayne. "I acted on your instructions sir," he continued, opening his pocket book.

"and followed her from Oaktree to London. Believe me, sir, that girl's a speed merchant and some more, but I didn't let her lose me until I'd trailed her to Gloster Road, Hampstead, where she parked her car outside number 57. Perhaps you don't know Gloster Road, sir. Self-contained flats, not very expensive. By judicious manipulation of the caretaker I found that it was Miss Gaynor's fifth visit in two days, and that Mr. Osbert Dwyer had been laid up with a cold since the day after Gaynor was found dead. She was there about three quarters of an hour, and when she left was looking worried."

Blayne listened to the young detective's narrative eagerly. "Many thanks, Roper," he complimented. "You've done a smart afternoon's work. Number 57, you said, didn't you?"

Roper nodded. "If there is anything else I can do for you, sir, the Inspector said I am entirely at your service."

"I'll let you know," Blayne told him thoughtfully. "Tell Inspector Webster I shall probably be around to see him early in the morning."

"Very good, sir." When Roper had gone Blayne dropped into a chair to think things over.

There were two courses open to him. Either he could go down once again to Red Gables and probe further into its mysteries for some sign of the Sons of Zora, or he could set off for Gloster Road, Hampstead, and interview Mr. Osbert Dwyer, the mysterious young man whom Sonia Gaynor so frequently visited.

At first he rather inclined to the first suggestion, but the thought of Sonia Gaynor having a lover upset his reasoning and Blayne decided to follow the latter course first, after explaining to Webster what he had heard from Winstanley. But see this man Dwyer he must. A sudden sense of jealousy overcame him. Hooker had been quite right. He was in love with the girl—sufficiently in love to realize the idea of another man being up-mast in her affections was agonising and not at all to his liking.

He was due out at seven for a dinner appointment with Dr. Charles Murray, the surgeon at the Critteron, and he was just about to ring for Hooker to inquire about his clothes when the telephone bell tinkled.

Blayne lifted the receiver. "Hello! Hello!" "Is that Dr. Peter Blayne," came a woman's voice.

"Speaking. Who is that?" "If you are in the habit of burning any of your correspondence," said the voice, ignoring his inquiry, "I should advise you to use your waste paper basket. It would be much safer."

The unexpectedness of the warning too him off his guard, but before he could open his lips he heard the receiver being replaced at the other end, and when he did inquire he found himself talking into a vacuum.

Blayne signalled frantically for the operator. "Who was that ringing me a moment ago?" he asked, quickly. "Can you find out for me? This is Gerard 936. I want to know—urgently."

A moment later he heard the operator's voice. "Your call was from a public call office in Oxford Street," it said.

CHAPTER XV CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE

Peter Blayne had no flair for the utterly melodramatic. The telephone warning he had received instead of scaring him merely made him irritable. The persons behind all this, he told himself, were not quite so clever as they endeavored to make themselves out to be. None of the really clever criminals he had known ever resorted to anything so amateurish as warning the police in this stupid fashion. They knew that the police as a body or individually, were not to be intimidated by such cinema serial tactics, and most of the anonymous communications of this character received by Scotland Yard are, as often as not, consigned to oblivion and promptly forgotten.

The following morning Blayne was early astir. He had a hospital appointment at ten, which lasted barely an hour, after which he decided to take the most obvious step in the line of his investigation and pay a morning call upon the gentleman who possessed himself of a self-contained flat at number 57, Gloster Road, Hampstead.

Blayne had a feeling as he walked along the road counting up the numbers of the houses, that at last he was going to find something concrete. But he was in no hurry. "The trees in the gardens of the old houses were donning their green jackets. Particularly was he interested in the pale green fans of the horse chestnuts and the bursting golden racemes of the laburnums. He had always had an ardent regard for Nature, probably because she was so thorough. That was where she differed—nothing was ever left to chance.

A large untidy woman in a rough apron was completing a vivid rough process at the foot of the flight of stone stairs that had obviously been built into the house when the structural conversion took place. She shuffled to one side as the young man approached.

HEALTH by A HEALTH SERVICE OF THE CANADIAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION AND LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES IN CANADA

VEGETABLES

It is generally known that vegetables have food value. Vitamins and minerals which are essential to proper growth and health are present in abundance in vegetables.

In order that the full food value of vegetables may be secured, it is necessary that special care be given to their preparation. The outside leaves to lettuce and cabbage, and in and just under the skin of potatoes and other root vegetables, are the parts where the valuable vitamins and minerals are to be found in largest quantities. It is obvious, then, that in the preparation of vegetables the outer leaves and the skins should not be thrown away, because in doing so we waste valuable food materials.

Practically this means that root vegetables should be cooked in their skins, and that the outside leaves of green vegetables should be used.

Vegetables are cooked in order to make them more appetizing—to look and taste better. When this can be accomplished by baking it is most satisfactory, as in baking no food value is lost. Other vegetables can be prepared by steaming, but most green vegetables are best prepared by boiling.

When vegetables are cooked in water, some of the constituents are dissolved and pass out into the water in which the vegetables are being boiled. This means a loss which can and should be prevented. In the first place, cooking should be continued only until the vegetable is tender. Overcooking spoils the appearance and the taste. The amount of water used should be the smallest amount required to give the best results in taste and appearance for each vegetable. In all cases, the water in which vegetables are boiled should be kept and used in gravies, soups and sauces. To pour the water down the sink is simply to throw away a large part, a most important part of the food value of the vegetables.

Compared to past generations, we are fortunate in our ability to secure a variety of vegetables at all seasons. Attention to the points mentioned will make vegetables more pleasing to the taste and in their appearance, and will, at the same time, secure the full food value.
