BARRY'S COLLABORATOR

Boy Friend's Bright Saying Brings a Half-penny at Every Performance.

That Mr. J. M. Barrie is not the sole author of "Little Mary," that he had a collaborator, who has drawn royalties, and that he has caused a legal document to be drawn up acknowledging the collaboration will be news to most persons.

Mr. Barrie has a long favorite companion, Tommy, son of Mr. Llewellyn Davist. One day Mr. Barrie brought his little friend some sweets.

"If I gave you these sweets and told you if you ate them you would be sick in the morning, what would you say?" he inquired.

Tommy instantly replied: "I'd say that I'd be sick to-night." Mr. Barrie was delighted.

"Give me permission to use that line in my new play," he said to the lad, "and as part author, you will receive royalties to the amount of a halfpenny for every performance given when the play is produced."

Permission was, of course, readily given and a contract was drawn up and duly signed and sealed.

At that time Mr. Barrie was writing "Little Mary." The line referred to has been utilized in the first act and always gets a big round of laughter, which is well worth the royalty it draws.

Lord Charles Bessford believes that the men of the Navy would be pleased if an eagle, which was a dog as the pet of the ship, and he thinks that the typical dog for the purpose is the bulldog.

It will be interesting to many to know that Lord Charles more years ago, he says, than he cares to remember, bred bulldogs himself.

When it was learned that Lord Charles was enthusiastic about having a bulldog on a warship, and that the dog must be one of the best, the matter was mentioned by a friend to Mr. W. Jefferies, vice-president of the London Bulldog Society, who has been called here and in American "The Napoleon of Bulldogdom," and who bred the famous Rodney Stone, which broke all bulldog records, and which Mr. Croker of New York, "The Boss of Tammany Hall," purchased for a thousand guineas.

Mr. Jefferies at once said he would be pleased if Lord Charles would accept from him one of his best puppies—Iron Stone, a grandson of Rodney Stone. Just as the old year was closing Lord Charles learned of this offer. He accepted it "with delight," and being a man of action, two days ago found him at the Rosneath kennels, for he went to get the dog himself.

The scene at the kennels was most interesting. First he found that the kennel-man was an old soldier and there was a hearty handshake, good wishes and a handsome present. Then "Let them come, good dogs," and Lord Charles had a lot of fine bulldogs clambering at him, the admiral being quite regardless of the damage to his clothes.

"He is a splendid fellow," he said. "I never saw such width or strength. No, I won't have him sent. I'll take him with me now, and he goes straight to H.M.S. Caesar." He will be adored by the crew and by the nine thousand men of the squadron. I hope we shall see one on every warship ere long. We shall all love to have such a pet." And so Lord Charles went off with his acquisition, grateful and delighted, and Iron Stone has been added to the strength of H.M.S. Caesar.—Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper.

STILL HEARTS OF OAK

Staff Our Sailors Are Made of Kings True in Times of Stress.

The Earl of Selborne, replying recently to a toast at a banquet, gave splendid assurance that the spirit of the men of the Baltic and Frigate still animates the navy.

This, after all, must always be the point which matters—Are your officers and are your men as good as they used to be? Now, the other day there was a test—such a test as I trust will not speedily recur—but a test which, as a test, occupies a very high place.

The Channel Fleet at midnight and without lights, as would have to be the case in war, were cruising and in the course of their work the Hannibal collided with the Prince George, and the result was a hole—a very large hole—was made in the side of the Prince George. Now, remember! No lights, a pitch-dark night, somewhere after midnight. Remember that the Channel Fleet is mainly composed of very young seamen. It is a little more than a training squadron. Remember, also, that the first thought of every officer and man in that ship must have been of the Victoria. And yet there was not the very slightest approach to panic.

I DRINK TO THE DEAD

I drink to the dead! Fill the glass brim high, silently drain it deep— I drink to the dead, who lonely lie sleeping, their faces pale as death— science! by gone be the soldiers' pride! That rests on the room as a spell! Here's the soldier in his blood-stained cloak!

And the maiden who loved so well! What shall the draught bring to the blood-red wine That flows from the troubled grape? But will that bring, say, and the wine? Though that wine is ever so sweet, So often in hours of friendliness, For a draught we pronounce may mean That would but be a bitter-sweet!

The water from the fountain of life! Not so! Not so! Let their memory stay in our hearts, use fresh and fair, And we shall see them again one day. Though years may come, and a withering care For over the waste of the Valley of Death, And over its darksome river, The path we must tread with our falling breath.

Is bridged by their love forever. —From "Last Words," by Captain Horace Townshend.
