MANY LARGE HATS IN LATEST SHOWS

NEW YORK — Many large hats are included in the new showings, most of them of fine hand-sewn braid, some faintly transparent for even greater lightness. There are both trimmed and untrimmed hats. Those without trimming have a dramatic sweep or coloring, the size frequently exaggerated by the addition of yards of veiling, some veils trailing almost to the hemline of a suit.

Others are trimmed in crisp bows of fine imported ribbon posed across the front of the brim in an eye-catching effect, or with single heads across the brim in much the same way. Geraniums often are on top of the brim, so that they show only slightly from the front, but bows of ribbon jut out in sharp accent.

The regular business was conducted and various reports made. One new member joined the Auxiliary on transfer from an out-of-town society. The visiting committee reported a total of fifty calls made during the month of April. Mrs. Colley conducted the worship service and Miss Edith Douse reviewed chapter 8 of the Study Book, "Significance of the Church in India," and succeeded in making a somewhat difficult subject very interesting and instructive. The meeting closed with the Mizpah Benediction.

Pain-Killing Uses Of Procaine Are Outlined

(By Alton L. Blakeslee)

BUFFALO, N. Y., May 8—(AP)—Striking relief from pain in many cases of arthritis, infantile paralysis, fractures and other injuries through procaine (novocaine) was reported today to the New York State Medical Society.

Some newer uses of the drug, through injection in extremely weak amounts into the vein, were described at a symposium at the Society's annual meeting. Procaine is a pain-reliever only, not a cure for disorders.

It shows great promise in treating congenital spastics, children who are crippled by muscle spasms, said Drs. David J. Graubard, Raphael W. Robertazzi and Milton C. Peterson of the reconstruction hospital unit, New York Post-Graduate Medical School and Hospital.

Another effective new use, they added, is reducing pain and increasing mobility in two types of arthritis—that resulting after injury, and osteoarthritis marked by excessive bone formation around ligaments and joints.

In fractures, wounds and other injuries, procaine can quickly reduce throbbing, burning pain, Dr. Graubard said. It also has been tried successfully to relieve pain and spasms in chronic stages of infantile paralysis.

Steadily growing uses already included relief of neuralgia and sciatica, the severe itching of jaundice and the pain of burns.

Congenital spastics have been given procaine infusions daily for several weeks in conjunction with physical therapy. The drug appears to break the cycle of the spasm, Dr. Gaubard said, and through exercises much of the temporary increased freedom of muscles can be maintained. The spastics also showed better coordination and improvement in speech, he reported.

Report Weather Conditions Delay Lobster Fishing

Two-thirds of the lobster gear in the western part of the Province has not yet been put in the water owing to the continuous rough weather, Mr. Chester P. McCarthy, general manager of the Tignish Fishermen's Union, informed the Guardian yesterday.

The few traps which have been fished, Mr. McCarthy said, show that lobsters off North Cape and Tignish are not plentiful. He believed the same conditions would apply off Alberton.

Herring, however, are now plentiful, Mr. McCarthy said, so that baiting the gear will offer no problem once the fishermen get it all into the water.

As the head of a co-operative factory, Mr. McCarthy said, he was unable to state what the fishermen woud receive for their lobsters. The private packers in his vicinity had not yet given the fishermen any idea of what they might expect for their fish.

It was his opinion that the fishermen should receive at least $12 per 100 lbs. for canners if they were to make any profit, Mr. McCarthy said.

Catches in the Georgetown area varied somewhat, with the fishermen on the outer grounds doing somewhat better than those fishing nearer to shore. However, the weather was delaying operations and only a part of the gear was in the water.

One report said some fishermen were averaging about a pound to a trap. There was no definite price, but rumors said it would be from 10 to 12 cents per pound for canners.

M.R.E.C. Convened In Toronto

Mr. Ralph C. Young, General Secretary of the M. R. E. C. returned recently from Toronto where he has been attending the Annual Meetings of the Department of Christian Education, Canadian Council of Churches. He reports that this gathering formerly known as the Religious Education Council of Canada, was attended by representatives from all Canadian Provinces. A Maritimer Rev. Dr. W. C. Machum has been appointed its first chairman. Appointees from the Church of England in Canada, Canadian Baptist Churches, Church, of Christ (Disciples) Presbyterian Church in Canada, and United Church of Canada, worked in harmonious fellowship to provide better leadership for thousands of ministers and lay workers in the field of Christian education throughout the Dominion.

Others attending the sessions were Rev. Dr. A. Gibson, Wolfville N. S., Rev. John Jarvie, Saskville, N. B.; Rev. I. Judson Levy, then of Charlottetown, P. E. I.; Miss Lois A. Tupper, and Miss Ada Adams Saint John, N. B.

Mr. Young referred to the high standing of the M R. E. C. among the Provincial Councils. All these bear the same relationship to the Department of Christian Education Canadian Council of Churches as they formerly did to the R. E. C. C.

Time Wrote A Word

Time penned a word that through the years
Bespeaks to me of love!
Of sacrifice, of hope and joy!
It breathes of things above.

Within that word a vision grows
Of gentle, loving care;
Of toilworn hands so quick to help!
Of silver-sprinkled hair.

It mirrors there a precious heart!
A prayer, a smile, a tear!
It sings again a lullaby
That banished childish fear.

It whispers sweet as time rolls on
Of tenderness and grace,
Of lovelight shining night and day!
Of lines upon a face.

Time wrote that word, naught can erase!
It's golden through and through!
A word none other can replace!
'Tis Mother kind and true.

—John of "The Lilacs"

Masters Of The Parachute Mail

By Peter Benedict

The window was useless; he tried the door. That, too, utterly defeated him; and if ever there had been designed a room to break the heart of a burglar, it was this one. He began to think, and seriously, that he would have to remain here until he fell into the hands of his enemies. And in that case, not only were his own hopes of survival relatively very small indeed; but also, the gang would be warned, and justice might say goodbye to them.

That was unthinkable. The people who had framed Peggy Calder! No, he could at least lodge information here and now against them. There was a telephone on the side table. There was a risk; there would be a house exchange. Or would there? For the telephone was a dial. No, the chances were it rang the local exchange direct, for it was evidently Mere Colibri's private line. At any rate, he would risk it. He dialled the Malbro; asked for Miss Vandeleur's room. He heard Peggy's voice, and it was music in his ears, if an anxious music.

"Peter, it is you! Oh, I've been worried stiff! Are you all right?"

"Yes, I'm all right. But listen, Peggy! This is urgent. In case I don't get back, I want you to know a few facts. If I fail to turn up tomorrow, they're to go to the police. You understand? Orders are sent back and forth between the depot in France, and the distribution in England by a Frenchman named Chacquard; he travels in French perfumes, for what firm I don't know, but they're the makers of 'La Minuit.' Got that? Hurry, I may not have much time! I—"

He broke off, listening with ears strained and heart pumping crazily. Subconsciously he heard, before he slipped back the telephone silently upon its stand, Peggy's agitated voice crying: "Peter—Peter, what's the matter? Peter do you hear?—are you still there?—what's happened?" The instrument slid into place, and her troubled voice was silent. He had not been mistaken. Someone was leisurely crossing the library towards the anteroom where he stood.

He had no time to get back into the window, and did not fancy the tapestry. There was only one thing to be done, which considerably simplified the issue. He dived behind the door, and it swung back into his face, and again Mere Colibri came in.

Characteristically, she came in with a slight, swaying dance-step improvised to the scrap of "La Source" which she was humming lightly in her lips. She passed him, and made for the book shelves, without troubling to put on the light, since obviously she knew her way round those books in the dark.

Peter stayed not upon the order of his going, but went, round the door and up the stairs blindly, on the tips of his toes, and running like a hare. Luck rather than judgment kept him to the clear passage in the dark library; he stumbled into nothing; he felt incapable of stumbling. His feet might have been the feet of the winged Mercury, messenger of the gods. As unofficial messenger of the omnipotent police he was at least half way towards the Olympian office.

Graham was with Corrie in the garden; Mere Colibri was hunting for a book, or possibly had found it by now, and was serenely on her way downstairs. He did not stop to look back, but leaped up the two flights of stairs and into his boxroom-studio without a pause, without feeling the strangling grip of the blood crowding his heart. There he closed the door softly and reverently, and leaned against it until he had recovered his breath.

The rest was easy. When he was rested he climbed out by his friendly window, and hauled himself stiffly over the edge of the parapet into the blessed gutter, and the quiet of the night. He had done it—small thanks, perhaps, to himself, but he had done it, and they were no wiser. What if the window of an attic remained open a little more widely than they had left it? One can hardly deduce from that the visit of a spy, unless there is other evidence in support; and there was none, or he hoped there was none.
