first Canadian to reach this far north and was quite a curiosity.

Not far from the station I stopped to gaze into a shop window. A long barreled single shot pistol caught my eye. I couldn't resist the temptation and bought it. It cost me the price. It was 10 shillings. I only had 11 shillings to my name.

What about something to eat on my way back to the Plains? I thought of the Pruckers, Books and the Williams. I saw a crowd of swarmed over the Plains. . . . the big German crows visited southern England in the winter only. . . . and in my minds eye I could see the camp rabbitingham in the cover of the little thorny clumps of trees. . . . called crows in England. . . . that dotted the Plains near our tent lines and my mind was made up.

I left the shop with the pistol, two boxes of ammunition, and 7 pence (14 cents) in my pocket. And thereby hangs a tale. I arrived at Cape, a big rail centre in the Midlands, where I was due to change trains for Bristol, in the grey dawn of Christmas morning. I had overlooked that train schedules would be mixed up on Christmas Day. An attendant informed me: "No trains to Bristol until late tonight." I explained that I was due back on Salisbury Plains in the morning. He was helpful. He said: "There is no leaving for Bristol (Birmingham) in a few minutes, you can get a train for Bristol from there at 10 o'clock." Somehow I managed to find my way through the maze of tracks and stairs and caught my train in time.

I found the station at Birmingham thronged with happy, parcel laden children and adults on their way to visit friends in the country. I was rather hungry by this time and spent 3 of my precious 7 pence for a cup of tea and a tart of some kind. . . . about enough to fill a hollow tooth. I travelled to Bristol in the compartment shared with a whole flock of toy laden kiddies and a pleasant motherly woman in her early thirties. I was feeling pretty low by this time and I guess showed it in spite of a brave front. I was only a kid in those days and it was my first Christmas away from my people. Once when I turned my head quickly I found the woman watching me with tears in her eyes. She wiped them away hurriedly and appeared as embarrassed as I was.

Bad news awaited me at Bristol. No trains to Lavington, nearest station to a West Downs North until the evening. By noon I was really starved and the 8 cents I had helped but little. I propped myself against a big pile of sand bags on the station platform and waited. I thought evening would never come. It would have been different if I had anything awaiting me at Journey's end.

I could picture No. 7 tent and

Wakening in the black pre-dawn

hour with the rain swishing on the canvas like it was poured from buckets and the wind blowing, and hearing the bugle blow Reveille. . . . I sold a horse, I sold a horse and bought a donkey and the son of a B he died. . . . of fumbling for a candle and trying to haul damp socks on one's feet, the stepping out of the tent flap into mud above one's ankles and following a weavy, cursing line of men barely distinguishable in the greying dawn to the horse lines. What a life!

I know old soldiers will be wondering why some predatory dame didn't turn up. One did. You might as well have the whole story. She was in her late twenties, I should judge, with black hair and had been pretty but was still passable. She was taller than the usual run, lean hipped and willowy.

Her first greeting was: "You look lonely Canada". How right she was. We indulged in a bit of chit chat and then I said: "You'll get no pickings off me kid. You're wasting your time. I'm broke flatter than scup on a plate." She looked me over. "I'm not looking for pickings. I have a cosy flat on X Street. Come and stay with me as long as you like. Lots to eat and drink and it won't cost you a penny. . . . and five quid when you leave."

I shook my head. I thought that in the long run it would be safer to stay where I was and hug the sand bags. Besides I was barely out of Sunday School and pretty 'gun shy' where dames were concerned.

Space does not permit a more detailed account of my day but I detoured at Lavington somewhere around 10.30. In the rain and darkness I missed the turn to Camp and stumbled 3 miles along the road to either Market or West Lavington I forget which. It was then near midnight. I saw a house lit up where a family Christmas party was in progress and walked in and asked for a drink of water and directions to camp.

I stood just inside the door and resisted their efforts to make me have something to eat and stay with them all night. The truth was I felt if I stayed too long I'd be down. . . . and Canadians were supposed to be tough with lots of money. A little flaxen haired girl came up to me and shyly offered me a couple of lead walfers. She was pleased as could be when I took them and ate them. . . . and so were the people in the house. I know now how badly I misjudged the English people. They were all ready to take me right to their hearts. . . . but I wouldn't let them. There were several mighty nice looking girls in the room too. I wasn't too far gone to notice that.

I groped my way along a two mile cart track to camp in a driving wind and rain. I could tell when I was getting near. I could hear horses kicking and squealing on the open lines and the cursing of the pickets. At 2.00 a.m. I reached No. 7 tent and undid the flap. There were 7 men in that tent and when I poked my head inside such a gust of foul air mixed with sweaty feet hit me in the face. I beaked out into the rain for a minute. There's nothing much worse than perfumed feet and we had two crows in No. 7 tent.

I crawled in and snuggled under the blankets alongside my buddy. . . . Bird by name and hailed from Bridgetown, N. S. "Have you anything to eat?" was my first request. Bird was quite a scrounger. He rummaged somewhere beneath his head and dug out the heel of an army loaf. It tasted like fruit cake. There was one bright spot ahead. As I dozed off I heard my buddy say: "You have odds of mail 7 parcels and 23 letters." Happy New Year folks.
