Attention
All Poultry Raisers

Now that it has been established that we are assured of a real good market for all the poultry meats we can produce, also, that egg prices will be maintained, throughout 1946, we have decided to continue hatching baby chicks until the second week in July. We can fill orders for delivery every TUESDAY AND FRIDAY, from now until the end of the season.

We urgently advise that you fill your hen house to capacity, for egg production, also finish all cockerels you can handle to meet this urgent need.

We can fill orders of any quantity, and suggest that farmers who hatch chicks with hens, add to their brood and give "Biddy" all she can handle.

CHAPTER XXV

Leslie tried to keep her voice hard and unfeeling. She was expecting to marry Anthony Orsini. So she worried about our stomachs, to shed tears for Presto. He was a dear boy—a kind brother—she broke off to make sure that Eustleigh understood about Presto. His warm big hand took hers as it had on the picnic, and this time did not let it go.

"Tough," he said. "I wish I'd looked you up. I was in Africa when Presto was killed. Two years in Africa. Perhaps you didn't know that. Eustleigh turned me down the year I finished Dartmouth. We were engaged a few months. Leslie knew. Eustleigh wasn't one to hide her conquests. I remember that you liked her," she said shyly.

"Oh, no! I didn't like her in the least. I was mad about her. But I didn't want to afflict myself on her after she'd turned me down with such a rousing smack. If I'd known how matters were, I'd have come home."

"You must know who Antonio Orsini is? The art collector with a private yacht and a palace or two. Anthony was the only child. He was three years younger than Leslie. His people were very bitter about the match. They said Eustleigh was reckless and she would ruin their son's life. Even after they were married, the Orsinis wouldn't receive them."

"But Eustleigh and Anthony didn't care. They were wrapped up in each other. Anthony was very nice to me and insisted on my living with them. He was the first to get work but he hadn't been trained to do anything. He had a small apartment. He was getting ten dollars a week and I can tell you, ten a week doesn't go far."

"When they knew little Tony was on the way, Anthony wrote to his people. They never answered. For that I can't forgive them. Afterwards Eustleigh was bitter about the Orsinis. When she went to the hospital she had to go in the ward and she couldn't afford a special nurse or her own doctor. Anthony and I felt terrible, but Eustleigh was more angry than grieved. She wouldn't give her own name at the hospital and she made up the silliest answers to the questions when she was admitted."

"Don't talk quite so loud, Leslie. You're letting yourself get excited. Hunt's deep voice was very kind. "Wag, I shouting. It's the first time I've told all the story and I don't do it well. While Eustleigh was in the hospital, we moved into a very small apartment. Poor girl! It was pretty hard for her to come home to such a place. She and Anthony began to quarrel a lot and yet they were mad about each other. He couldn't find work and he lounged around the flat and looked after the baby while I was at the office. Eustleigh didn't get her strength back."

"But she enjoyed her baby?"

Leslie hesitated. "She wasn't able to take care of him. It's doing things for a baby that makes you realize how wonderful he is."

"So you and his father took care of him?"

"I was there nights and mornings. And Sundays, of course. Anthony was the one who used to watch him sleeping. I can scarcely keep from crying."

"Go on, Leslie. I wish the story could end happily."

"Perhaps the ending isn't altogether sad. They were together when they died and Tony was only two months old—too young to miss them."

"Who was driving?"

"Eustleigh. I don't think Anthony would have had the nerve. He was reckless, but not brave."

"You're sure it was deliberate?"

She did not answer for a minute. Then she said in a low voice, "Knowing Eustleigh, I couldn't doubt it."

"I believe you said they hadn't a car?"

"I was hired from a place in the next block. But you mustn't think the owner lost anything by the accident. He rents cars, and they are all insured. The driver's tone in which she gave this explanation showed how her mind had been forced to consider painful and sordid details."

"And the Orsinis? Did you tell them?"

"But they heard. How do people hear of their tragedies? Radio, telegram, telephone, reporter, an army waiting to carry bad tidings. I was in the apartment when it happened. I was expecting something terrible. Eustleigh had been so strange when she went out. She made me promise that if anything went wrong with her, I'd never let the Orsinis have Tony. Someone telephoned to the apartment. When I saw I couldn't do anything for Eustleigh or Anthony, I raced back to the apartment and bundled Tony and all his little belongings into a taxi. Then I took him straight to Mary Blunt's. She was my mother's maid and afterward, nurse to us children. She used to stay here at Rocky Point with us in the old days."

"I dumped Tony into her arms and told her what had happened and went back to the apartment to make sure I'd left nothing of Tony's. I was expecting the Orsinis. Now they'd simply have to come. They'd want Tony. Well, I thought, I'll bring up Tony to be honorable and serious, to value simple pleasures, to be kind and considerate of others, and to realize that while it costs to be kind, one mustn't boggle at the price. At the least the rich lead artificial lives. Tony shall see reality close enough so that he won't be afraid of it. You see, Eustleigh, I simply couldn't let those millionaires get hold of him."

He did not answer, but he continued to hold her hand and his warm clasp made her feel that he understood her conduct and approved it. Then she thought, "What if he doesn't think me in the right?"

"Are they put me in prison?"

He started. "Don't worry about that. But you've not finished the story. You tell me your motives dingy corner. A chauffeur held the door open. A small woman in black—not mourning—very elegant looking, and a short fat man got out. I waited while they talked upstairs. I opened the door and stood just inside. I was sorry for them. But I couldn't let them have my Tony.

"You are Leslie Vance?" she began. I suppose she'd never seen me before. My husband and I would like to attend to everything. They shall be buried together. Everything as you wish it."

"I've no money for a proper funeral," I answered. "You see how we've been living."

While she was walking softly through the rooms, I stood wondering if I'd left anything of Tony's where she'd see it. When she came back, she said, "We heard that a child was expected. That was a mistake. I told her. You can see for yourself there's no child here." (To Be Continued)
