Believed Islander Killed By Train

ST. STEPHEN, N. B., Sept. 16.—Identified by the registration slip in his vest pocket, the terribly mutilated body of 22-year-old John Edward Cameron, who was instantly killed when struck about a mile north of Lawrence Station by the train from McAdam to St. Stephen on Saturday evening, is being held in an undertaking parlor in St. Stephen, awaiting further information as to his relatives.

The tragedy happened at Cleghorn's Crossing, thirteen miles south of McAdam, at 7.25 P. M. Engineer J. Monteith saw a dark patch lying between the rails and immediately applied the emergency brake, but was unable to stop before hitting it. He got out and found a smear of blood on the front of the engine and notified the train crew. Conductor Charles Halston and Fireman P. G. Hitchcock went to the rear of the train and two cars attached to the engine were horrified to find a foot, piece of a leg, and the headless body of a man lying some forty or fifty feet behind the track with clothing strewn around. Conductor Halston went to Watt Junction and communicated with the superintendent's office at Woodstock, and the R. C. M. P. at St. Stephen, N. B. The latter advised that the detachment at McAdam take charge and Constable J. Thompson and McAdam Town Marshal Estey were quickly on the scene.

The head was found by the constable and others at some distance from the track, and the coat and vest with some new articles of clothing which unfortunate man had been carrying were on the track; his watch was a spot where a depression between the rails showed he had been lying when struck. It had stopped at 7.43. In his pocket was eighty-five dollars. A felt hat was picked up on the track a quarter mile south of the crossing. Frank Anderson of Lawrence Station told the officers he believed the unrecognizable body

The Farm Woodlot A Valuable Asset

BY B. H. D. LONG

Many farmers attach little value to the farm woodlot. Little care is taken to keep the woodlot in a healthy, fast-growing condition and no provision is made to insure a continuous supply of wood for the future. This is a sad mistake which has been made in other places and will be realized here also if steps are not taken to introduce a sound system of woodlot management.

In most cases the woodlot occupies land which is unfit for growing other crops, the land being too rocky, sandy or boggy to support anything but trees. All such lands should be given over to trees. It will be of no advantage to the farmer to clear such land but on the contrary he will find that trees are the most valuable crop he can grow on these areas.

Trees serve many valuable purposes. They are valuable in conserving soil moisture, preventing excessive evaporation from the soil and preventing rapid run off of water after rains. The trees hold the moisture and give it out gradually, insuring a steady supply of moisture to farm crops growing near by. Trees prevent erosion by binding the soil and by depositing a layer of litter which soaks up and obstructs the flow of water on the surface of the soil. This protective quality of trees is especially valuable on steep hillsides. Trees give protection to game and to songbirds which destroy large numbers of injurious insects. The transpiration of water from the leaves of trees helps to modify air temperature making it cooler in summer, warmer in winter. Trees are valuable as windbreaks to protect field crops and to prevent snow drifting in the winter. Trees along streams and rivers protect the banks from washing away and prevent floods by holding moisture and letting it out gradually to feed the streams. They also improve stream conditions for game fish by supplying shade and food. Fish obtain much of their food from insects which drop from the trees into the water. When trees are removed from the banks of the stream, this source of food is removed and may result in the disappearance of fish from the stream. Aside from these values, there is the value of the wood itself. Among the products that may be obtained from farmers' woodlots are lumber, pulpwood, shinglewood, pit-props, boxwood, cooperage, tool handles and many others. Much of the wood used in the wood-using industries of this country comes from farmers' woodlots and it is essential for the combination of these industries that conservation be practiced. The farmer can by intelligent management conserve his supply of wood so that he will always be able to cut each year enough for his own use and also a certain amount to sell.

Since wood operations are most economically conducted during the winter months when the farmer is not occupied with his crops, the farmer will find his woodlot a valuable asset in giving him work and wages at a time of the year when these are most needed. The woodlot rather than being the most useless part of the farm can be made to yield a substantial income.

Trees when properly managed grow surprisingly fast and will yield as much as ten per cent interest per year. Money invested in trees will thus earn more than stocks or bonds.

The woodlots on this Island can be made to produce most of the lumber consumed here. Proper woodlot management would make it unnecessary to import lumber, would keep the money at home to give employment to residents of this Province and would insure a continuous supply of high grade wood for the future.
