One Man's Wife

By BARBARA WEBB Copyright

Yvonne was going shopping. For a month she had lived her ordered life without excitement of any kind. It had been two weeks now since Richard wrote her. True, his letters had been brief and business like, signed, "Affectionately your, Richard," but they had been big events in her life. She had written faithfully to the address he had sent her, telling him in French the doings of her little day in the house. She took great pleasure in writing these letters and spared no pains in making them neat and easily read. Twice each week she had spent an hour composing them. Now she had written four times to him and had received no answer. She felt desperately lonely this day. Mrs. Ogden had urged her to accept some of the invitations that came to her, had offered to sponsor her appearance in some of the pleasure resorts at nights after her number was over, or at luncheons at some of the gay hotels. Yvonne had refused.

"I might some day be recognized," she said. "I dare not take any chances of that."

"Well, come out with me and buy some pretty clothes anyway. Nothing cheers a woman up like buying pretty things. You mustn't sit here moping."

Yvonne had consented and was now waiting, wearing her black crepe dress and coat, for Mrs. Ogden to arrive. They drove down 5th avenue, past the windows full of rarely beautiful things.

"Let's walk!" Yvonne cried as they waited long minutes before a traffic signal.

Mrs. Ogden agreed good naturedly and they started on foot up the avenue. Presently Yvonne paused before a window, filled with revolving figures wearing wigs. Red, brown, blond, curled, straight, marcelled, they turned solemnly on their waxen heads.

Yvonne looked at Mrs. Ogden her eyes sparkling. "Suppose I bought one of those," she said. "I could make my face up to match. Would it be possible for any one to recognize me?"

"I shouldn't think so," Mrs. Ogden answered. "A wig, the right kind of make-up, new clothes, and you'd be a different person. Come, let us do it. Then leave Lottie at the house and you be my house guest for two weeks. We'll give you a name and I'll take you to luncheons and matinees and explain that your doctor has forbidden your going out evenings."

Yvonne's eyes sparkled. "If it looks well, I'll do that I long to know just what the society is that Richard has known so well in the past."

What the society is that Richard has known so well in the past. "I'll ask Anne Lovelace and Bob West to a tea, the very first thing," Mrs. Ogden said daintily. "How will that be?"

"I should be horribly frightened," Yvonne said, shivering.

"Well, we won't decide definitely about it now. We'll have to see first how you look in a wig."

They went into the store and were shown into a private booth, while a salesgirl brought in various samples of wigs. Yvonne's thick curls had to be plastered to her head with some special preparation. Then came the trying on of various styles. Yvonne wanted a blonde bob. At last one was found, parted on the side, curling over the back. It fitted her perfectly.

"Bring me make-up," she commanded the girl. "Blond make-up."

The girl returned with various jars and boxes. For half an hour Yvonne worked skillfully with the pigments and pastes. Then she placed the wig carefully over her head. The result was astonishing.

Yvonne had vanished. In her place was a sophisticated, rather hard-looking young woman who quite plainly knew her way about. Mrs. Ogden laughed delightedly.

"You'll have to be a widow, my dear. Not even our flappies flappers look as wise as you do. It is really funny when I think how innocent you really are."

Yvonne rose. "Then there really isn't any danger of my being recognized?" she asked. "Not a particle. Come along, let's get some clothes. I know just the place for you to shop. I'm going to have more fun than I've ever had in my life introducing you these next few weeks. The woman will be quite sure you are dyed and make up to look about ten years younger than you really are. And I will know that you are made up to look about ten years older than you really are."

"It's the mystery about her that keep people stirred up so," said the first speaker. "Of course she can dance, but it is clever of her not to let any one know who she is."

"I'm sure she's a Russian!" the speaker was sitting next to Yvonne "some one who escaped from the
