Underbidding is Sometimes Wise

It is sometimes a good idea to underbid a hand deliberately in the hope of acquiring further information from partner. Today's deal fits into this category.

This was the actual bidding in a supposedly advanced game:

North	East	South	West
1♠	Pass	1♥	Pass
2♠	Pass	3NT	Pass
Pass	Pass

Naturally, West opened diamonds, and forthwith cashed in six tricks in that suit while the declarer was helplessly discarding winners!

From South's point of view, his three honor-tricks opposite an opening bid warranted strong action, and since North had shown a disposition to "sign off" on the second round, South made his leap to game in the fear that any lesser bid might be dropped.

North, for his part, was delighted to play at three notrump on this particular bidding, feeling that he would deliver six solid club tricks to the common cause.

Granting that South had a good hand under the circumstances, he still could have afforded to bid only two notrump over two clubs. North would not "hang" one trick short of game except with a hopeless holding; and by giving North a greater voice in the proceedings South would have made it possible for his partner to give a belated heart raise. In other words, over two notrump North certainly would bid three hearts (not having raised previously) rather than rush into notrump with his singleton diamond.

Thus, by underbidding slightly South would invite the cooperation of his partner in selecting the final contract, whereas by jumping straight to three notrump he would, psychologically and practically, make North feel that his advice was not needed.
